I favor a permanent ban on credit card surcharges. And I feel that a majority of Americans feel the same way. During hearings held last week by the Consumer Affairs and Coinage Subcommittee, there was widespread support for a permanent ban. However, when the subcommittee met in executive session to mark up the legislation, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE), the ranking minority member of the full Banking Committee, informed me that he had consulted with Members of the other body and he was convinced that the other body would not accept a permanent surcharge ban at this time. He consequently had several telephone conversations with the chairman of the Banking Committee of the other body, who, according to the gentleman from Ohio, would accept the legislation which we bring before you today.

Quite frankly, I would not have agreed to the compromise bill, which not only calls for a 14-month ban, but also a study by the Federal Trade Commission and the General Accounting Office on the whole credit card question unless I had received public reassurances from the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE), that this legislation was acceptable to the other body.

I was fully prepared to move a permanent ban on surcharges. But with some 600 million credit cards in circulation in this country, and 7 out of 10 households using credit cards, I did not want to gamble with a further delay in enacting legislation to resolve the credit card dilemma.

Mr. Speaker, we must all face reality. We live in a credit card economy. More than $200 billion worth of credit card purchases were made last year, and that figure is expected to increase dramatically this year. And to those who believe that credit cards are only for the rich, let me point out that 41 percent of all adults in this country who earn less than $10,000 a year use credit cards. Nearly 50 percent of our senior citizens use credit cards, and well over one-half of the adult women in this country use credit cards. I would suggest that it is not the rich who are credit card beneficiaries, but rather it is the men and women of America who work hard for a living that use the convenience of credit cards.

How many Americans, for example, are able to pay cash for major repairs on their automobiles? If cash were their only choice, they might well not choose to use their car until they had saved enough money to pay for the repairs.

And what about vacations? How many Americans use a credit card for a few weeks of well-earned rest and budget the payments over a period of time?

I have received many letters from senior citizens living on fixed incomes who tell me that the credit card is a necessity, and in some cases a life-saving economic support system. Many senior citizens need credit cards for extra medical purchases when an unexpected health emergency arises.

And what about emergency travel plans? How many Americans can pay cash for long-distance airplane tickets when emergency travel is required?

And what will happen to our economy if a significant portion of the $200 billion a year in credit card usage is reduced?

To those who say that cash customers are subsidizing credit card customers because a merchant increases his prices to cover credit card costs, I would point out that there is no such proof that exists that this is the case in reality. Even the Federal Reserve, in its credit card study of last year, could not find conclusive evidence of such subsidization. And even if such a belief were true, are we naive enough to believe that if merchants could surcharge a credit card the cost savings will be passed on to cash customers? Absolutely not.

We live in a real world and I know of no merchant who is going to give away his money or his profit to another customer. The cost savings will be passed right on to the pocketbook and the pockets of that merchant.

A small percentage of merchants in this country believe that surcharges should be allowed so that they can recover the service charge fee that they must pay to credit card companies.

Yet not one of these merchants that I have heard from has indicated that they would pass the savings on to a cash customer. Most have made it quite clear they would pocket the money themselves.

I do not understand why some merchants complain about the cost of accepting credit cards when there is clearly a course of action that will solve their problems. No one forces a businessman to accept a credit card. A merchant who is unhappy with credit cards should simply refuse to accept credit cards. He should put a big sign up on his window, "I don't accept credit cards." Some businesses have gone that route, and that is the proper way to deal with the problem.

Several witnesses who appeared before my subcommittee pointed out that the costs of a merchant accepting credit cards may actually be lower than a merchant who operates on a cash only basis. Bad checks cost businesses far more than credit card service charges. Insurance rates are much higher for businesses with a large cash volume. Cash requires security since it must be stored and transported to the bank periodically.

In addition, credit card accounting is much easier since the processing bank handles almost all of the paperwork.

I am not here today to sell businesses on credit cards. Rather I am here today to ask this body not to punish a large portion of the citizens of this country who use credit cards. This legislation will help people without punishing anyone. Under this bill the cash discount system, which I authored several years ago, will remain in effect. That system allows merchants to offer unlimited cash discounts.

However, a bill passed by the other body would limit cash discounts to only 5 percent and allow a 5 percent surcharge on credit card purchases.

No one has been able to explain to me why we should limit cash discounts to 5 percent. If a merchant wants to give you 10- or 20-percent discount for cash in order to stimulate sales, should we pass a Federal law barring such a practice?

I want to help, like you do. Every politician, every Member of this Congress is not elected by hurting people. We are elected by helping people. I want to help credit card users. I want to help the cash payers. I do not want to penalize either group, but the legislation passed by the other body not only hurts credit card users, but hurts cash customers and merchants as well.

To use a popular phrase in both advertising and politics of late, the question is: "Where's the beef?" The beef is in the House bill. The legislation from the other body also contains meat, but unfortunately that meat is all baloney.

We already have too much crime in America and in many States our prisons are so full that the courts are requiring that certain criminals be released prior to the completion of the sentence. The other body would create a whole new class of criminals so that in addition to the murderers, the rapists, the armed robbers, the kidnappers, the child molesters, we would now have the cash discount criminal who, under the other body's legislation, would be fined $5,000 and sentenced to a year in jail for giving a customer a 6 percent cash discount of a 7 percent cash discount. I thought we were trying to fight crime in America, but apparently there are some lawmakers who do their very best to create crime in America and that is exactly what the other body has done in their legislation when they limited cash discounts to 5 percent.

I realize there are many Members who feel that they do not have all of the facts concerning credit card surcharges, and that is why the study approach has been suggested. The Federal Reserve did contract out an earlier study, but even supporters of that study recognize that it has serious flaws. The study provided for in H.R. 5026 would provide direct congressional input to the study through the GAO. Such a procedure will make certain that the study is conducted so as to give Members of this House and the other body full and complete information on which to base legislative judgments.

Although the title of the study is quite limited in the legislation, it is my intention that the study should be as broad as possible on the question of credit usage and cost, to the credit cardholder and the business accepting such cards.

For example, is the extra income generated to a business by credit card sales enough to offset the service fee charged to businesses by credit card companies? We also need to know the cost of credit card transactions versus those of checks and cash.

In short, we need a comprehensive study dealing fully and completely with the costs of credit cards and a determination as to how to make the beneficiary of credit card usage pay for it without hurting the cash customer.

The legislation before the Members today will provide this body with the time and the information to make an informed judgment rather than forcing this body to make a snap judgment which could have drastic results.

I know that many Members have received correspondence from their constituents urging a permanent surcharge ban. I support that position, although such an objective will be difficult, given the stance of the other body.

I honestly feel that those credit cardholders who are writing the Members asking for a permanent ban will be willing to settle for the 14-month temporary ban while Congress obtains this additional information. By voting for this legislation today, you will be able to respond to those letters in a very positive manner.

However, if this legislation is defeated, I predict the letters we are now receiving will only be a small portion of the millions and millions of letters and cards that will be pouring in protesting legislation action that will hurt many and will help no one.

I want to urge my colleagues as your chairman of the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs and Coinage, I want to urge you from the very bottom of my heart that before you cast your vote think seriously about what you are doing today. This legislation is very important legislation to millions and millions of Americans who are becoming disgusted, who are becoming disoriented from the political processes in this country, because every time they turn around the Congress is saddling on their back additional costs. They are paying additional State taxes, they are paying additional city taxes, they are paying more and more taxes to the Federal Government. And now we are saying to these millions of Americans that if you purchase by a credit card that we are going to charge you an extra 5 percent, therefore contributing to the erosion of the greatest standard of living that the world has ever known, because the less money that people have to spend, the more and more erosion of the standard of living.

So I want to say to my colleagues in the House today to vote "aye" on this legislation. Let us have a study for 14 months. Let us come back at the end of 14 months to protect the best interests of the cash discount customers and to protect the best interests of those people who are already paying excessive charges for the privilege of using their credit cards. But if people want to pay an excessive charge to use their credit cards, that is their own business. It is not my business, but it is my business as chairman of the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs to make sure that no additional charges are placed on this person carrying a credit card that winds up into the pocketbook of the merchants.

So I ask my colleagues today to vote "aye" on H.R. 5026.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) has consumed 16 minutes.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5026 with the amendment offered by the chairman of the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs, my good friend from Chicago, FRANK ANNUNZIO. It is a compromise that we agree is important to resolve both a short-term problem and a longer term question about the regulation of charges for the use of alternate methods of payment. I know of the strong feelings of the gentleman from Illinois on this issue. I also know of the strong feelings of the Senator from Utah (Mr. GARN), two gentlemen firm in principle. So I want to commend Chairman ANNUNZIO for expeditiously moving this legislation to the House floor and for his willingness to work together to forge a pragmatic compromise.

H.R. 5026 as introduced calls for a permanent ban on credit card surcharges, but my substitute amendment, which Congressman ANNUNZIO accepted—but, as he said, only after I had talked to the gentleman from Utah, Senator GARN, and received an agreement from him—passed the Consumer Affairs Subcommittee unanimously last week. The amendment provides for a temporary extension of the surcharge ban and requires the Federal Trade Commission and the General Accounting Office to do a study to determine various ways in which the cost of using credit cards can be borne directly by persons who use or benefit from credit cards. During the course of the subcommittee deliberations, I had several conversations with the distinguished chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, Senator JAKE GARN, and he agreed that the language before us today was a reasonable compromise. Hopefully, the other body will act on this bill quickly and bring some sense of order to a situation which has the potential for being quite disorderly.

For the immediate future, we believe it is most important to continue the Federal prohibition surcharges on payments by credit card. A part of the problem is that every State has laws and regulations affecting any retailer who might try to put a surcharge on credit card transactions. The laws are not uniform in application, however, with the expiration of the Cash Discount Act on February 27, 1984, many people have already been given the wrong idea that surcharges are now unregulated by any level of goverment. H.R. 5026 makes it clear to everyone that there is a law which applies to all 50 States against the practice, at least until May 31, 1985.

Congress has a very important responsibility to regulate interstate commerce. Without this legislation today there is no uniformity under the law for different kinds of credit cards. We have not agreed to make this extension of the law permanent, however, because as we learned in testimony before the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs, there are several different issues involved here.

Different kinds of credit cards are regulated differently, even though most of them are used interchangeably by consumers and often accepted without discrimination by sellers. Cards issued by banks are regulated, under the National Bank Act; cards issued by commercial firms are regulated by the laws protecting cardholders in different jurisdictions; and the travel-entertainment card issuers have carefully avoided calling their cards credit cards to bypass the regulations affecting all the others. This situation requires congressional action because there is an unequal application of the laws to a common commercial practice that is very important to the growth and prosperity of our national economy.

The issue at hand is not so much whether there should be surcharges for the use of credit cards, but how to permit transactions costs and finance costs to be legally distinguished. There is an obligation that Congress should fulfill, to let the States regulate finance charges as they will but to provide for interstate commerce in a uniform regulatory environment as regards transactions charges.

The regulation of finance charges by the Truth in Lending Act and the various usury laws of the 50 States demonstrate a traditional public interest in a standardized way to disclose the terms of credit and equitable dealings between borrower and lender; but most of the costs associated with the use of credit cards are not the costs of lending. The costs of processing the transactions, not of financing them, are most relevant. Clearly the short period between purchase and payment that the cardholder enjoys is a financial benefit, but this is also true of payments from a checking account. The costs of checking accounts are considered transactions costs, not finance costs.

Should cards that extend credit be regulated differently from cards that extend credibility? To the extent a credit card is like an identification card, guaranteeing a merchant payment for his goods, it is more like a check drawn on a demand deposit than like a loan from a bank. Should cards issued by banks be regulated differently from cards issued by retail stores, major oil companies, or financial service conglomerates that do not engage in commercial banking? These are questions that need to be answered.

The other proposal the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs considered, S. 2336, would have let the free market have a wider latitude in setting retail prices differently for payments by check or by credit card. The subcommittee, however, has agreed the issue is not whether the free market should set prices—it already does that. The issue is whether the procedures of the Truth in Lending Act, which require a universal disclosure procedure, are consistent with a different situation; namely, identifying and recovering the costs of transactions under different payment methods. A genuine free-market answer would permit a variety of ways that suppliers and consumers could do business. A law that expects sellers to act as collectors for the costs of card issuers, by means of surcharges or by a generally higher business overhead to pass the costs on to consumers, is not a free-market answer.

This legislation, H.R. 5026, asks the Federal Trade Commission and the Comptroller General to conduct a study to determine the various ways in which the cost of using credit cards can be borne directly by persons who use or benefit from them. The costs and benefits have to be considered in the context of our full payments system. One of the main arguments of those who favor the imposition of surcharges for the use of credit cards is a belief that there is a subsidy, paid by nonusers, for the benefits to both consumers and merchants who use and accept credit cards. It seems more cogent, however, that what may look like a subsidy is in fact just a third party collection technique imposed by laws and regulations.

We need a microeconomic study of the impact of regulation. It is regrettable that we must delay 1 year finding the correct path for permanent legislation, but the testimony we heard before the subcommittee last week demonstrates there are many possible ideas for reforming laws and regulations both at the Federal level and the State and local levels.

We want the two agencies we believe are most competent to explore the problem to give us their advice after a thorough and impartial review of every interested party's evidence. The Federal Trade Commission has special expertise in the area of competition and interstate commerce; the General Accounting Office has special expertise in the impact and administration of Government programs and regulations; and each agency is well suited to evaluate and recommend changes.

We trust the agencies will make extensive use of the research the companies who offer consumers various payment cards and devices have already done over many years, to keep the costs of this study down. Our Banking Committee staff will be available to consult with the agencies to assure that the study, as it proceeds, will be exactly what Congress is looking for to enact permanent legislation in this area next year.

We expect that in 1 year, the Federal Trade Commission and the Comptroller General will be able to make specific and practical recommendations to the Congress for changes in Federal law that will permit us to establish a uniform national regulatory environment for the various means of indirect payment, which do not use money. In common parlance, we talk about using credit cards; but we in fact are concerned with all forms of payment that do not use cash or checks—what some flippantly call plastic money. We believe that an impartial evaluation of the conflicting issues and claims that were presented to our subcommittee will be able to resolve them in the public interest. Congress must fulfill its constitutional duty of regulating interstate commerce so that a nationwide market can function efficiently for not only the current methods of paying for goods and services without cash but also the new systems and methods that we already know are being designed.

A new, uniform Federal regulatory environment for noncash payments must take a forward-looking perspective. One hundred years ago, demand deposit accounts in banks that could be transferred by check were just beginning to emerge as a modern convenience in payments. Today we are witnessing more rapid progress and diversity in our financial services industry than ever before.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the immediate approval of this bill, to provide for the temporary extension of the ban on credit card surcharges and for a report from the Federal Trade Commission and the Comptroller General about what we can best do by May 31, 1985, to create a uniform nationwide system of regulation for all payment devices and alternatives to cash.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE) has consumed 6 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK), a member of the full Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the gentleman's yielding to me since he knows that, despite my great respect for him, I disagree with him on this bill.

Having listened to that stirring tribute to the act of patriotism that is implicit in the carrying of a credit card, I am reluctant to oppose the gentleman, and I certainly do not want to demean the deep-rooted Americanism that motivates people to use their credit cards.

But I think it would be a mistake for Congress to dictate to the retail industry what they should and should not do with regard to this very basic marketing decision.

I would disagree that those of us who are going to vote no, as I am, are seeking to impose any cost on any particular group of consumers. The question is whether the Congress and the President should decide that we know better than the retail industry what the pricing ought to be in literally millions of transactions throughout the country in hundreds of thousands of retail establishments.

It may or may not be cheaper or more expensive for people to use credit cards versus cash in various locations. It may or may not be in the interest of the retailer to impose a surcharge for credit cards. We do know that among the industries in this country where competition appears to work the way the free enterprise model would have it work is the retail industry.

It would seem to me ironic for so many of my colleagues, who are great advocates of deregulation in principle, to vote for what would be one of the most onerous regulations; namely, to say that for the next 14 months, while we are studying it, no retail merchant anywhere may decide that he or she wants to charge a certain amount for the use of a credit card. That does not seem to me the kind of decision that we ought to preempt.

I must say I was struck by some of the commercial entities—I believe the American Bankers Association wants to impose this congressional enactment; I know American Express does. I would just urge my friends, the bankers, the next time they come around and tell us how legislatively enacted interest-rate ceilings are a terrible interference with the market, and when they tell us also again about how important the free market is, that they might remember that when some of the bankers had an interest in preventing the free market from working, they had no hesitation in coming to Congress.

Now, not everything in America is taxes. Let us be very clear about that. Hypocrisy remains free. There is no tax whatsoever on hypocrisy.

But I think we ought to be clear what we are doing. We are being asked, in the teeth of all of the rhetoric we get about deregulation, to say, with regard to a competitive industry, retailing, we the Government of the United States will make for you this pricing decision in every way. It seems to me a retrograde step, it seems to me that the economy works better if we allow the market, when we have genuinely competitive systems, to work.

I appreciate the kind of compromise the gentleman is attempting to forge. I think there are positive elements in it. And I regret having to be the unpleasant one at this bipartisan party that is apparently both bipartisan and bicameral. But as much as it has been sugar coated, the fact remains the Members are being asked today to set themselves up as the super supermarket, super retail establishment of American, and we are being asked that we vote yes to make the decision for every retail transaction that is to go on in the United States in the next 14 months, that it cannot include a surcharge for a credit card.

I think we ought to study this, but I think we would get a much better study, and the gentleman has said, and I will finish with this, that we do not have people that are likely to put it into effect.

Let us experiment with the surcharge being allowed and then we will have some real evidence to measure.

● Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 5026, and urge my colleagues to join me in protecting consumers from any further extension of a credit card surcharge ban.

This is one of the few occasions when consumer groups, the Reagan administration and the Federal Reserve Board are in complete agreement. A ban on credit card surcharges, they argue, forces merchants to pass on the costs of processing credit card purchases to cash and credit customers alike. In other words, the ban forces low- and middle-income cash customers to subsidize wealthier credit customers.

Clearly, then, a vote against H.R. 5026 is a proconsumer vote. Rather than extend the ban for another year while we wait for a joint Federal Trade Commission/General Accounting Office study on alternatives to the ban, we should give cash consumers the price relief they deserve today and let the marketplace determine the costs to those who prefer to use credit cards.

I urge my colleagues to cast a nay vote and take this important step to protect the American consumer.●

● Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, we are so used to spending billions and billions of dollars of taxpayers' money that this extension of the statutory ban on the imposition by merchants of surcharges to customers who use credit cards may seem such a little thing.

But I hasten to assure you this is no little thing to the American consumers.

Passage of H.R. 5026 will reimpose through May 31, 1985, the credit card surcharge ban that expired February 27 of this year. Passage also will trigger a study by the appropriate agencies of the Federal Government to determine how best to develop a uniform, nationwide system of regulating credit card payments.

The regulations now differ depending on whether it is a bank card, a travel card, and so on to the point it seems as if the same committee of architects that built the tower Babel sat down at a table and, without understanding one another, drafted these regulations.

Often we hear in these Chambers the cry, "Give the consumers a break." Well, this will give them a break.

If we extend this ban, the situation will be this:

Merchants can continue to use a two-tiered pricing method, charging customers who pay cash a lower price than the posted regular price. But they will not be able to charge credit card customers a price higher than the posted price.

That is all in the world this does. And I for one believe it is in the best interest of the American consumers. And I hope H.R. 5026 will be supported by this House.●

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to lend my support today to H.R. 5026, the Truth in Lending Act amendments.

As a strong and consistent opponent of credit card surcharges, I want to commend my colleague from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) for his initiative in bringing this legislation—which will extend the ban on credit card surcharges to May 31, 1985—before the House today.

Mr. Speaker, Congress first banned surcharges in 1976 for a 3-year trial period. The ban was extended in 1979 for an additional 2-year period. In 1981, I joined the vast majority of the House, 372 to 4, in extending the ban for 3 years. On November 16, 1983, I once again voted for legislation, H.R. 4278, to extend the ban until July 31, 1984. Similar legislation was passed in the Senate, however, the conference committee designated to resolve the difference in the two bills was unable to do so prior to the expiration of the ban on surcharges which occurred on February 27, 1984.

In 1981, when Congress voted to extend the surcharge ban for 3 years, we also removed the 5-percent limitation on cash discounts so that merchants would be allowed to offer unlimited cash discounts if they desired. I believe that the combination of a ban on credit card surcharges and the allowance of unlimited cash discounts has served us well.

Mr. Speaker, according to a survey of the Federal Reserve, 10.7 percent of all retailers who accept credit cards now offer cash discounts. Many of those merchants offer discounts greater than 5 percent. The Federal Reserve study also found that 71 percent of merchants thought that surcharges were a bad idea. In light of this information, the evidence appears overwhelming that we should continue to ban credit card surcharges while allowing merchants to offer cash discounts.

We are a nation of credit card users with more than 600 million credit cards in circulation in this country. Every year more than $200 billion is charged on credit cards. These credit cards are not just luxuries that only the rich can afford. One of four adults with incomes below $10,000 are credit card users, while nearly 50 percent of our Nation's senior citizens use credit cards.

I am very concerned about our senior citizens, and for that matter many other citizens, who need credit cards because they do not want to go around with large amounts of cash and run the risk of being robbery victims. A surcharge may pressure these individuals into carrying more cash and thus make them more vulnerable to criminal attacks.

There are several additional disadvantages in allowing merchants to tack on a surcharge to their customers who pay with credit cards. The possibility of price confusion regarding an advertised item would be enormous. Merchants would be offering regular prices, surcharges, and discounts. In effect, people would either be paying the discount price or the surcharge price. Few people, if any, would actually wind up paying the regular price.

Mr. Speaker, the amount of business in many stores has actually increased because customers may use credit cards. As we all know, it is an elementary principle of economics that as volume increases merchants are able to offer lower prices.

Congress has repeatedly approved the use of cash discounts and the ban on surcharges. This system has served us well. Therefore, I am pleased that we have had the opportunity to take this positive action on behalf of both consumers and merchants today. I am hopeful that the Senate will soon concur so that we can finally resolve this situation and alleviate the legitimate concerns of millions of Americans.●

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5026, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

The point of order of no quorum is considered withdrawn.

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATION OF MARITIME PROGRAMS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 470 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 470

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4706) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1985 for certain maritime programs of the Department of Transportation, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MOAKLEY) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. QUILLEN) for purposes of debate only, pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 470 is the rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 4706, the authorization for maritime programs of the Department of Transportation for fiscal year 1985. It is completely open and provides for 1 hour of general debate. No waivers of points of order are included.

Finally Mr. Speaker, upon conclusion of consideration of the bill for amendment the rule provides for one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4706 is an annual authorization that permits the appropriation of funds for certain maritime programs administered by the Maritime Administration. The total amount of the authorization is $468.5 million. Most of the funds authorized would go to the payment of operating differential subsidies. These subsidies are paid to U.S. companies to enable them to operate U.S.-flag ships competitively in the U.S. foreign trade by offsetting the excess of U.S. ship operating costs over comparable foreign ship operating costs.

In addition, H.R. 4706 would authorize funds for research and development and operating and training. Also, H.R. 4706 would make funds available to aid the six State maritime academies to help pay the cost of fuel for training vessels, and to complete the conversion of a training vessel to replace the Bay State, the Massachusetts Maritime Training Academy's vessel that was destroyed by fire.

Mr. Speaker, this is a worthwhile authorization for programs which I have enthusiastically supported over the years. I urge adoption of the rule so that the House will have an opportunity to consider this legislation.

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the rule has been ably explained; it is an open rule. If there is any controversy at all, it can be discussed during the debate on the bill itself. The rule is not controversial. The bill is important, authorizing appropriations for the various maritime programs; and, Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of the rule and the bill on final passage.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 470 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 4706.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4706) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1985 for certain maritime programs of the Department of Transportation, and for other purposes, with Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. SNYDER) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES).

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, before discussing the bill before us, to which I rise in strong support, I would like to express appreciation to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) and the Committee on Rules for expediting their consideration of our request for a rule. It has been too long since an authorization for the Maritime Administration has been enacted, and with the help of the Rules Committee, I believe that this year we present an unburdened bill that will be sent to the President.

The authorization bill before us is a routine Maritime Administration authorization for appropriations, and the total amount authorized is $468,557,000. The sums requested are generally in the same amounts as those line items were requested by the Administration with a few minor exceptions. The exceptions are: The addition of $3 million for fuel oil assistance to the State maritime academies; the addition of $77,000 for student incentive payments; and the addition of $5,000,000 to provide adequate funding for the conversion of a vessel for use as a school ship by the Massachusetts Maritime Academy.

The bill, as reported, contains no legislation other than to identify sums authorized to be appropriated for the Maritime Administration.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 4706 authorizes levels of appropriation more than $17 million below those appropriated for 1984, a drop of about 4 percent. It represents a responsible authorization providing for a minimal program, given the strategic importance of the U.S. merchant marine. I ask my colleagues to join me in support of H.R. 4706.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI).

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the full Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries for yielding this time to me, and I also commend him for his work in connection with this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4706. This is a routine annual authorization bill that authorizes appropriations for certain maritime programs administered by the Maritime Administration of the Department of Transportation for fiscal year 1985. These programs are related to the development of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States and the national defense through an adequate and capable American merchant marine.

I am pleased to report that this bill does not contain any nonfiscal matters and that it closely parallels the administration's budget submission. The administration requested an authorization level of about $460.5 million. The bill before us authorizes a total of $468.5 million or about $8 million above the administration's request. I believe that the additional funding that we are providing is necessary, is reasonable, and is fiscally responsible.

The $8 million difference will provide: $3 million for financial assistance to the State maritime academies for fuel oil for the operation of training vessels; $77,000 for the retention of existing funding for student incentive payment agreements; and $5 million for the conversion of a vessel for use as a training ship.

The bill, as reported, authorizes a total appropriation that includes the following: $377.75 million for operating differential subsidies; $10 million for research and development; $9.11 million for national security support capability; $21.94 million for maritime training at the Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point; $14.2 million for State maritime academies; $5 million for conversion of a training vessel; and $30.55 million for other training programs and operating expenses.

The largest single item authorizes funding for obligations incurred for operating differential subsidies. These obligations are the primary means of Federal support for the competitive operation of the U.S.-flag merchant fleet engaged in the foreign commerce of the United States. The 1985 budget authority includes estimated liabilities for operation of 124 liners and 18 bulk vessels under agreements with 17 operators. This does not provide funding for any new contract authority.

I also consider it important to comment briefly on the funding that is requested for the conversion of the Santa Mercedes for use as a school ship for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The administration's request contemplates the use of carryover funds of $5.8 million for this conversion. Testimony at the hearing and subsequent inquiries have indicated that these funds are not sufficient for permitting an adequate and timely conversion. An extensive study effort on the selection, acquisition, and refitting of the Santa Mercedes as a training vessel concluded that at least $12 million would be required for the conversion. Subsequent estimates came in at $16 and $18 million. The administration acknowledges that these higher figures will permit a number of desirable modifications and arrangements but that they cannot support these expenditures during times of budgetary restraint. The committee, in an effort to arrive at a reasonable and cost-benefit solution, added $5 million for the conversion. This provides a funding level of $10.8 million, $1.2 million less than the original estimate and considerably less than the final $18 million estimate.

In summing up I believe that H.R. 4706, as reported, represents a necessary and reasonable proposal for maritime programs and is consistent with our desire for fiscal restraint. The total authorization level is about 4 percent below the amount that was appropriated for fiscal year 1984 and only represents about 1.6 percent of the $29 billion being requested for all programs of the Department of Transportation.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this legislation deserves our colleagues' support, and I hope it will be enacted forthwith.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4706, a bill to authorize appropriations to the Maritime Administration for fiscal year 1985, and for other purposes.

As has already been explained by the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the gentleman from North Carolina, H.R. 4706 authorizes a total of $468.6 million for MARAD's programs in fiscal year 1985, a total which is $8.077 million above that requested by the administration. I know of no significant opposition to the bill as it is before us today, although the administration has indicated it will seek reductions totaling $8 million as the authorizing legislation works its way through the other body.

I might comment briefly on one area of concern to the administration: The authorization in this bill for an additional $5 million to be made available for the conversion of the Massachusetts Marine Academy's training vessel, the Santa Mercedes. While I remain unconvinced that those moneys, in addition to the $5.8 million carryover funds budgeted by the administration for the conversion work, are absolutely essential in order to make the vessel a suitable training platform, I must say that we have seen nothing in the way of hard data to refute the claimed need for additional funds. I understand that a reliable estimate of the funds required will not be available until the actual plans and specifications for the conversion are formulated and bids solicited and received. That may not occur until at least July 1 of this year, making it questionable whether that additional data will be available in time to assist our colleagues on the Appropriations Subcommittee on Commerce, Justice, State, and Judiciary in putting together their numbers for the Maritime Administration for fiscal year 1985. So, what we are faced with is the authorization and possible appropriation of funds which no one can say with any certainty are sufficient, insufficient, or more than sufficient to accomplish the intended purpose.

Members will note that this MarAd authorization bill is remarkably bare bones compared to its most recent predecessors, which have been laden with substantive legislation of such controversy and disagreement that there has been no independently enacted authorization for the last 3 fiscal years. The noncontroversial nature of this legislation did not develop by accident, Mr. Chairman, and I compliment the gentleman from New York, the subcommittee chairman, for his resolve in seeing to it that we have a bill before us which can be enacted into law.

Because the committee has not loaded up this authorization with major policy-type provisions, there is some indication that the Subcommittee on Merchant Marine and the full committee will attempt to move substantive legislation yet during this session, including some sort of separate funding authorization in support of the domestic shipyards by the May 15 reporting deadline. The committee's views and estimates, adopted on March 14, have provided for such a separate initiative.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Members to support H.R. 4706, the MarAd authorization bill. I am confident that our swift action will lead to similar consideration in the other body and that differences, if any, can be easily resolved in conference.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. STUDDS).

Mr. STUDDS. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the MarAd authorization bill. I am especially pleased that the legislation includes $5 million to be used in conversion of the cargo ship, Santa Mercedes, to a training vessel for the Massachusetts Maritime Academy.

Since December 1981, when a tragic fire destroyed the training ship, the Bay State, and took the life of one cadet, the Massachusetts Maritime Academy has been without its own vessel. In recent years, the school has been forced to borrow a ship from either the Maine or New York academies, an arrangement that has created large administrative problems and worked to the detriment of all students involved.

In fiscal year 1983, Congress authorized and appropriated some $10 million for MarAd to either repair or replace the Bay State. I am pleased that the Santa Mercedes has now been purchased for this purpose. However, I am concerned that MarAd does not have adequate funds available to carry out the needed conversion. Approximately $5.8 million remains from the $10 million already made available by the Congress, but this is clearly insufficient to do the job right. MarAd and I say this in respone to the observations of the gentleman from Kentucky, will need at least the $5 million made available by this bill to provide the academy with the facility that its students deserve and require.

The gentleman is correct that no one can say with certainty at this point what the final bill will be, but I think if anything is certain in this world it is that this will not cover it.

I also want to take this opportunity to, on behalf of the faculty and students of the Massachusetts Maritime Academy, thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI), the chairman of the subcommittee, for his efforts. As he well knows, what we do with respect to the determination of the adequacy of conversion of this vessel will set a precedent for conversions of vessels still to come, presumably for the remaining academies, one of which, as the gentleman well knows, is in the State of New York.

I thank the gentleman very much for his leadership and I urge strong support of the bill.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

H.R. 4706

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That funds are authorized to be appropriated for the use of the Department of Transportation for the fiscal year 1985 as follows:

(a) for payment of obligations incurred for operating differential subsidy, not to exceed $377,750,000;

(b) for expenses necessary for research and development activities, not to exceed $10,000,000;

(c) for expenses necessary for operations and training activities, not to exceed $75,807,000, including not to exceed—

(1) $37,550,000 for maritime education and training expenses, including not to exceed $21,940,000 for maritime training at the Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point, New York, $11,200,000 for financial assistance to State maritime academies, $3,000,000 for fuel oil assistance to State maritime academy training vessels, and $1,410,000 for expenses necessary for additional training;

(2) $9,111,000 for national security support capabilities, including not to exceed $7,506,000 for reserve fleet expenses and $1,605,000 for emergency planning operations; and

(3) $29,146,000 for other operations and training expenses.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: page 2, line 8, strike "$75,807,000" and substitute "$80,807,000";

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be considered en bloc, considered as read, and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The remaining committee amendments are as follows:

Committee amendments: Page 2, on line 10, strike "$37,550,000" and substitute "$42,550,000"; on line 14, strike "$11,200,000" and substitute "$16,200,000"; and on line 15, after "academies," add "of which $5,000,000 shall be for the conversion of the Santa Mercedes for use as a suitable training vessel,".

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. JONES) wish to debate the committee amendments?

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I explained the amendments in my opening statement.

The CHAIRMAN. If not, the question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there other amendments? If not, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) having assumed the chair, Mr. MITCHELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4706) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1985 for certain maritime programs of the Department of Transportation, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 470, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who wish to do so may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 4072, WHEAT IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1983

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 4072) to provide for an improved program for wheat.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of April 2, 1984, the conference report is considered as having been read.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of April 2, 1984, at page 7306.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA) will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA).

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am bringing to you today a conference report on H.R. 4072. This measure provides substantial cost savings in the farm programs by freezing target prices—in the case of wheat for the 1984 and 1985 crops and in the case of the other major crops for the 1985 crop.

The target prices serve as a basis for payments to farmers to make up the deficiency that occurs when market prices fall below the target prices set by law. The net result of this action is to save almost $2.7 billion in Government costs for the period through 1987, thereby providing an important contribution toward control of the Federal deficit. This action is of particular importance on the eve of consideration of the first budget resolution. I might say that enactment of this report has been assumed in the various budget proposals that will shortly be before the House. The conference report is a bipartisan measure that has the full support of the administration.

There are other important features in the conference report that have been agreed to by the administration in return for the cost saving features of the report. These other features are of significant importance to the farmers of the United States.

First, this measure provides increased incentives for farmer participation in the surplus control programs for wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, and rice. This aspect of the bill will help bring better balance between supply and demand thereby assuring a more solvent agricultural economy and in the long run save the Government costly expenditures.

The conference report expands Government efforts to boost agricultural exports. The export provisions will help redress the sharp fall-off in exports of U.S.-produced agricultural commodities that has occurred in recent years. When this administration took office, exports had reached a high of approximately $43.8 billion, but for a variety of reasons they shrank sharply to $34.8 billion in fiscal year 1983 and have revived some this year. Despite the need to strengthen our balance of payments, the President recommended in his budget a reduction of a billion dollars in the off-budget export guarantee program. The report affirms a commitment by the administration to restore those funds and provide other incentives for adding to our exports. It will also establish a new expedited program for sharing our abundance of surplus dairy products and wheat with needy people overseas.

Finally, the report contains several important farm credit provisions. It requires the Department of Agriculture to open up its economic emergency loan program to direct loans so that the program which was initiated in December as a result of court action will be available to the farmers in need as required. It also includes a number of actions which the administration could have taken under its existing discretionary authority but has failed to take.

H.R. 4072 originated in the House as a bill with provisions relating solely to wheat. In the Senate, provisions relating to the other issues were added to the bill. Many of the items relating to the agricultural credit programs are similar to provisions that had passed the House 2 years ago and again last year in H.R. 1190. The conference report includes many compromises. It does not include a number of provisions which were favored by a majority of the House conferees but which we could not persuade our Senate friends to adopt. Many of us would have liked to have included a number of additional provisions—for example, provisions relating to soil conservation, such as sodbuster and conservation reserve features. I want my colleagues to understand that we have not given up. We will continue our efforts for their adoption.

The benefits of the conference report are not limited to farmers, Mr. Speaker. They accrue as well to the consumer, the processor, and the middleman. These sectors of the economy depend upon a stable supply of food and fiber at reasonable prices. They must be able to plan ahead in making budgetary decisions. The conference report contributes toward this objective by promoting economic conditions under which producers can continue to supply quality food at stable prices.

I might add at this point, Mr. Speaker, that the American consumer, that is, the American family receives the best quality food in the world, possibly in the history of the world, for the least amount of disposable income of any major country in the world. Mr. Speaker, in recent years, more often than not, they are able to purchase at market prices which are less than it costs the farmer to produce.

I might add here, Mr. Speaker, that we in the United States have a responsibility, and I think it is a legitimate function of government that we work with our farm sector to stabilize the supply, enhance the quality wherever possible, and stabilize the cost to the consumer. I say this because today in the United States of America our balance of trade is negative and getting worse daily. One of the only positive elements is the agricultural sector. It pains me to have to say this, and I ask my colleagues from urban and other nonagricultural areas to listen to me when I say that a healthy farm economy is needed to enhance the position of the United States in our balance of trade.

The world is no longer buying what we manufacture. They do not buy our cars, our television sets, our calculators, et cetera, and this is too bad. We have to work and see if we can turn that around. But for the time being, they are buying what we produce in agriculture. This is a positive sign.

The conference report is not a perfect measure. This is not the measure that I would write if I were doing it by myself. This is not the measure that our committee, the Committee on Agriculture, would write if we were doing it in a vacuum. But we have to deal with reality. We have to deal with the art of the possible and craft legislation that is viable, that saves money, and that accomplishes the intended end purpose of the agricultural sector.

There are some members of our committee who are not happy with this legislation. There are some areas that were not touched. There are some areas that were not amended, and possibly we will hear from them later.

But I ask them, Mr. Speaker, and I ask my colleagues to understand my situation. This is the best we could do under the circumstances in which we find ourselves. More often than not, the agricultural community finds itself in a position of having to take less than we would like to have. But we have to take what we see as a viable, workable alternative to chaos and economic ruin and forestall eventually, heaven forbid, the destruction of that great factor which is the agricultural productivity of this great country of ours.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to summarize for the information of the members, the highlights of the conference report.

First, for wheat, the report provides as follows:

It provides a target price of $4.38 per bushel for both 1984 and 1985, instead of $4.45 and $4.65 in those 2 years as provided in current law. For the 1984 and 1985 crops, it provides that growers who want to qualify for price supports must make a total acreage cutback of not more than 30 percent. This cutback would consist of not more than a 20-percent unpaid acreage reduction plus a 10-percent paid diversion, with a payment rate of at least $2.70 per bushel. At least 50 percent of the diversion payments must be made at the time growers enroll in the program.

It provides that for the 1984 crop, in addition to the 30-percent acreage cut required to qualify for price supports, growers would have the further option of making an additional 10- to 20-percent acreage reduction, with payment to be made in kind, in the form of wheat, rather than in cash. The payment rate would be based on 85 percent of the farm program yield rather than the 75 percent set earlier by the administration. The bill also permits haying and grazing of acreage diverted from production under the 1984 wheat program at the option of the State ASC committee.

Second, for feed grains, the report provides as follows:

It leaves the 1984 program unchanged, but freezes the 1985 corn target price at $3.03 per bushel—the 1984 level—instead of the $3.18 provided in current law. For the 1985 crop, it provides that if the Secretary estimates that the corn carryover level on September 30, 1985, will exceed 1.1 billion bushels, the Secretary must establish an acreage retirement system as a condition of eligibility for price support. The total acreage cutback required for eligibility would be 5 to 20 percent, with diversion payments to producers on not less than 5 percent of whatever total is announced by the Secretary. If the total reduction required exceeds 15 percent, the excess over that level would be equally divided between paid diversion and unpaid acreage reduction. If the total reduction is 20 percent, for example, 7.5 percent would be on a paid basis. At least 50 percent of the diversion payment would be made at the time of signup and the payment rate must be at least $1.50 per bushel.

It authorizes the Secretary to make price support loans to producers who cut their 1984 or 1985-crop corn for silage. The loans would not be made directly on the silage.

They would be made on other 1984 or 1985 corn acquired by the producer to serve as security for the loan.

Third, for upland cotton, the report provides as follows:

It leaves the 1984 program unchanged, but freezes the 1985 target price at 81 cents per pound, the 1984 level, instead of the 86 cents required by current law. Also for the 1985 crop, it provides that if the Secretary estimates that the upland cotton carryover level on July 31, 1985, will exceed 3.7 million bales, he shall require any grower who wants price support to make a total acreage cutback of at least 5 percent. If the Secretary determines that a deeper production cut is needed, he could require further reductions. For the initial 5 percent reduction, growers would get diversion payments of at least 27.5 cents a pound. There would be no payment for any further required diversions which bring the overall acreage cut to a total of 25 percent, but payments woud be made on any portion of the total reduction ordered beyond 25 percent. If the Secretary estimates that the carryover on July 1, 1985, will exceed 4.1 million bales, the diversion payment rate will be at least 30 cents, and if the carryover is estimated at more than 4.7 million bales, the payment rate must be at least 35 cents. At least 50 percent of whatever diversion payment is due to a producer would be paid at the time of signup.

Fourth, for rice, the report provides as follows:

It leaves the 1984 program unchanged, but freezes the 1985 target price at $11.90 per hundredweight, the 1984 level, instead of the $12.40 required by existing law. Also for the 1985 crop, it provides that if the Secretary estimates that the rice carryover level on July 31, 1985, will exceed 25 million hundredweight, the Secretary shall require growers who want to be eligible for price support to make a total acreage cutback of at least 25 percent. The cutback would include an unpaid reduction of 20 percent, and payments at a rate of at least $2.70 per hundredweight would be made for reductions above 20 percent. At least 50 percent of the diversion payment would be made at the time of signup. If the Secretary estimates that the carryover level of rice on July 31, 1985, will exceed 35 million hundredweight, the payment rate will be at least $3.25 per hundredweight, and if he forecasts the carryover at more than 42.5 million hundredweight, the payment rate will be at least $3.50 per hundredweight.

Fifth, for agricultural credit, the report provides as follows:

It requires the Secretary to make Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) natural disaster emergency loans available based on individual production losses for producers whose operations are located in counties contiguous to counties in which the Secretary has found that farming operations have been substantially affected by a disaster.

It permits applications for natural disaster emergency loans to be filed within 8 months of the disaster declaration. Also, it permits the valuation of farm assets used as collateral for emergency loans to be based on the value of those assets 1 year before the date the Governor requests disaster assstance, if that value is higher than the current value.

Regarding the $600 million economic emergency loan program to be carried out under a Federal court order during fiscal year 1984, the conference report requires that at least $310 million of the total will be available for insured economic emergency loans. This is $250 million above the currently scheduled allocation for insured economic emergency loans. Further, the report authorizes the Secretary to raise the insured loan total above $310 million if necessary to achieve program goals, after taking into account the amount used for guaranteed loans.

It raises the loan limits for loans made to farmers for operating purposes from $100,000 to $200,000 for insured loans, and from $200,000 to $400,000 for guaranteed loans.

It extends the maximum repayment period for consolidated or rescheduled FmHA farm operating loans from 7 to 15 years.

It requires that any insured farm loan that is deferred, consolidated, rescheduled, or reamortized bear an interest rate—for the remaining balance and term of the original loan—either at the original rate or the then-current rate, whichever is lower.

It insures that at least 20 percent of the farm ownership and annual operating loans for fiscal year 1984 go to low-income, limited resources farmers who most need this assistance.

It prohibits FmHA employees who act upon or review an application made by a farmer for the purchase of a particular parcel of real estate from purchasing any interest in that real estate for 3 years.

It authorizes the Secretary to develop and implement a program for the amortization of FmHA loans from future revenues generated by timber crops on land previously used for commodity production and subject to existing FmHA liens. The Secretary is required to report to Congress within 180 days on the feasibility of such a program.

Sixth, the export program provisions in the conference report are as follows:

It expresses, as the sense of Congress, a request for prompt implementation by the administration of its agreement to: First, ask for appropriations providing $325 million in additional funds for Public Law 480. This would include $150 million for use in fiscal year 1984, in addition to the President's earlier request for a $90 million supplemental appropriation for drought relief to Africa, and $175 million for use in fiscal year 1985; second, provide in fiscal year 1985 an additional $100 million for direct export credit programs, and request or use another $50 million for either Public Law 480 or direct export credit programs; and third, provide for an increase of $500 million in export loan guarantees for fiscal year 1984 and a $1.1 billion increase for fiscal year 1985.

It establishes a 2-year pilot program under which the Commodity Credit Corporation will use surplus dairy products to acquire, through barter or exchange, 40,000 metric tons of ultra-high temperature processed fluid milk for donation to needy persons outside the United States.

It gives the Secretary authority under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 to donate wheat, as he now can donate dairy products, to needy persons in foreign countries. Also, the bill would allow donated commodities to be bartered or sold, with the proceeds and services to be used for activities consistent with providing food assistance to needy people. Commodities would be donated for carrying out title II of Public Law 480, as approved by the Secretary, under expedited procedures. The donated commodities could be provided under multiyear agreements, and the Commodity Credit Corporation would be authorized to pay transportation, reprocessing, packaging, and similar costs associated with such donations.

For the information of my colleagues in the House I also wish to summarize the differnces between the conference report and the Senate-passed bill.

1. UPLAND COTTON

The conference report would change the Senate provisions relating to the acreage reduction program which the Secretary must implement if the upland cotton carryover is estimated to exceed a trigger level of 3.7 billion pounds. The conference report would require a minimum acreage reduction of 5 percent in lieu of a minimum of 25 percent as in the Senate amendment and the required reduction would be paid. The Secretary would have discretion to provide for an additional reduction in acreage of which anything up to 20 percent would not be paid and anything in excess would be paid. The conference report would also change the payment rate for the paid diversion program, if the carryover is between 3.7 million and 4.1 million bales, from 25 to 27½ cents per pound.

2. RICE

The conference report would provide for a third trigger level and associated payment rate for the 1985 cropland diversion program; that is, if the Secretary implements a paid diversion program and the rice carryover is estimated at between 35 and 42.5 million hundredweight, the diversion payment rate would be a minimum of $3.25 per hundredweight in lieu of $2.70 in the Senate-passed bill.

3. CORN FOR SILAGE

The conference report would authorize the Secretary to make price support loans and purchases available to eligible producers who cut corn of the 1984 and 1985 crops for silage. Under the conference report, the loans and purchases would be based on a quantity of corn of the same crop, other than the corn cut for silage, acquired by the producer equivalent to a quantity determined by multiplying the acreage of corn cut for silage by the lower of the farm program payment yield or the actual yield on a field that the Secretary determines is similar to the field from which the silage was obtained.

4. EXPANDED AUTHORITY FOR THE DONATION ABROAD OF CCC STOCKS

The conference report would provide for the donation of dairy products and wheat for carrying out title II of Public Law 480, if approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. It requires, to the maximum extent practicable, expedited procedures in implementing these provisions. It also would restrict the sales and barter of the donated commodities and products as authorized by the Senate amendment to those approved by the Secretary and to the following cases: First, sales and barter which are incidental to the donation of the commodities or products, such as sales and barter of goods which are damaged or otherwise unfit for distribution to needy people; second, sales and barter, the proceeds of which are used to finance the distribution, handling, and processing costs of the donated commodities in the importing country or other activities in the importing country that are consistent with providing food assistance to needy people; and third, sales and barter of commodities and products donated to intergovernmental organizations, insofar as they are consistent with normal programing procedures in the distribution of commodities by those organizations. In no vent may dairy products and wheat be made available for disposition in amounts that will, in any way, reduce the amounts of commodities that traditionally are made available through donations to domestic feeding programs or agencies.

5. CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

The conference report would modify the Senate amendment that prohibits FmHA officers or employees from purchasing land for a period of 3 years after the date on which they act on or review an application for a loan to purchase such land. A new provision is added to make the prohibition inapplicable to a former member of a FmHA county committee upon a determination by the Secretary, prior to the acquisition of land, that the former member acted in good faith when he considered the loan application.

We have also included in the statement of managers language that more fully explains the intent of the conferees on the issues in the report. They are summarized as follows:

1. PEANUTS

The statement of managers urges the Secretary to reconsider his action in revising the manner in which the cost of production of peanuts is computed, a change that may result in a reduced computed cost of production and thereby a negative effect on the support price for quota peanuts; and reminds the Secretary of the discretionary authority he has to avoid inequitable results in reducing quotas for individual farms to achieve prescribed reductions in State peanut quotas.

2. LIMITED RESOURCE BORROWERS

The statement of managers expresses the conferees' intent that funds designated for limited resource applicants may be used within a State for operating loans for other applicants to the extent that funds designated for limited resource applicants exceed the demand therefor.

3. CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

The statement of managers expresses the conferees' intent that the Secretary's determination that a former county committee member used good faith in considering the application for a loan on land he now wishes to acquire, be based on the clear and convincing evidence submitted by the former committee member and consideration of all the relevant circumstances. It also points out that the provisions of the report would not apply to a committee member who recuses himself from any consideration of the loan application.

The statement of managers further expresses the conferees' intent that the Secretary use bid procedures in making arrangements for operating or leasing farmland acquired by the Secretary under FmHA farm programs, and carefully manage the sale of such land, and, in general, not make sales in areas where excess farm acreage is on the market.

4. EXPORT ASSISTANCE TO AFRICA

The statement of managers notes that severe food shortages exist in a number of poor countries, particularly the drought stricken areas of Africa, and urges the administration to move as large a volume of commodities as possible under Public Law 480 to Africa for use in areas where needed.

5. ACQUISITION AND DONATION OF ULTRA-HIGH TEMPERATURE PROCESSED MILK

The statement of managers provides that if it proves impossible to distribute the UHT milk without undue waste CCC would not have to do so; and that CCC would have to receive requests from abroad for the milk before it would be required to make the milk available. The intention is also expressed that the pilot program be operated in such a manner as not to disrupt commercial markets.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I am happy to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the chairman of the full committee for making a fairly good work product—because none of us thinks it is a perfect bill, as the gentleman said—out of an almost impossible situation. I think to a large extent that was due to the efforts of the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY), and others who were able to fashion a bill which will help a little bit.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this conference report.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DURBIN).

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman of the committee for yielding, and I would like to applaud the efforts of the conference committee on this bill. I believe the bill is fiscally realistic and fiscally responsible.

Many of us would like to see different things done for the crops that affect our areas, but I believe this is the best we can do this year to make a positive statement on our future farm program.

I would also like to applaud the work of the conference committee in adding a piece of legislation to the conference report which is very important to me and to the Senator from the State of Illinois. This particular provision relates to conflict of interest in the Farmers Home Administration, and I think it is a very positive step.

I might finally say that the work this bill does on credit to the farm may be the most important aspect of the bill for the portion of the country that I represent.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the committee for its fine work, and I look forward to supporting the measure.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DURBIN).

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Montana (Mr. MARLENEE).

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support of the conference report on H.R. 4072, the Agricultural Programs Adjustment Act of 1984, and urge its speedy passage. Producers have been held in suspense for too long. I was an original cosponsor of the original H.R. 4072, the Wheat Improvement Act of 1983, which passed the House under the adept leadership of Wheat Subcommittee Chairman FOLEY on November 16, 1983, on suspension by voice vote. My statement on the floor of the House on that day remains appropriate today.

Mr. Speaker, as the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Wheat, Soybeans and Feed Grains from which H.R. 4072 originated, and as one representing a large wheat producing district, I have been very active in supporting and promoting this legislation from the beginning. I am gratified that the other body has seen fit to adopt the approach and all the major features of the original H.R. 4072 and in fact to extend to 10 percent paid diversion to the 1985 crop year. The other amendments in the Senate version were relatively minor, and now that they have been agreed to by the conference committee, the result will be a much improved program for 1984 and 1985. Along with greater participation come the benefits of slowing down the rate of growth of surplus or carryover stocks, now approximately 1.5 billion bushels, as well as greater returns to the producer.

Another benefit is the assurance that we have something in place for the 1985 crop year. Hopefully when we create a 4-year bill we can eliminate the year-to-year uncertainty that has existed. What this bill does is build a bridge to that time when we can write a better farm bill that promotes exports.

Mr. Speaker, the conference committee did its job diligently in compromising on the major outline of the various commodity programs for the 1984 and 1985 crops. This will enable those of us on the Agriculture Committee responsible for crafting the 1985 farm bill to take the calmer approach to that task and to devote the time necessary to write a long-term bill that hopefully will take a new and creative approach.

Regarding title I on wheat, it was my understanding that the Secretary of Agriculture would provide the same treatment for summer fallow producers in the 1985 wheat program as is being provided in the 1984 program. While we did not feel it necessary to include this in the statutory language, that understanding is covered in the joint explanatory statement of the conference committee. The statutory language of section 606 of the conference report as well as the statement of managers are intended to make it clear that a FmHA county committee member may excuse or recuse himself from any consideration of a loan application, thereby avoid any conflict of interest and not be covered by the 3-year prohibition provided in section 606.

Mr. Speaker, like any compromise this conference report may not be perfect, but it represents very substantial progress in settling major provisions of the various commodity programs for 2 years while also providing export, credit, and drought relief features. I urge my colleagues to approve this conference report.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished majority whip and vice chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY).

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman very much. I appreciate the gentleman from Texas yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, as the original sponsor of H.R. 4072, the Wheat Improvement Act of 1983, I rise in strong support of the subsequent Senate amendments to that legislation and of the conference report before us today.

When I introduced H.R. 4072 last October, I did so out of a growing concern that the 1984 wheat acreage reduction program announced by the Department of Agriculture in August would not attract sufficient producer participation to be effective in controlling program costs over the next several years. Indeed, if commodity programs are to be cost effective, which they must be if public support for them is to continue, then they must be designed to insure enough participation on the part of producers to make them work. As originally introduced for wheat, H.R. 4072 embodied that principle.

For this reason and because of the genuine need for the steps which it takes, I am especially gratified that in the intervening months the administration, reversing its earlier opposition to the bill, has come to recognize that H.R. 4072 not only provides the base for a sounder wheat program for 1984 but also promises to be more cost-effective. I welcome both their support for the principles underlying this legislation and the encouragement they gave the Senate to extend them to the feed grain, cotton, and rice programs.

I also want to take this opportunity to commend the Senate for its contributions in adding amendments that strengthen our farm credit and export programs.

Credit remains a serious problem for farmers, and the threat of foreclosure is certainly the most demoralizing aspect of the recession in the agricultural economy.

During the last 2 years, over 15,000 farmers with Farmers Home Administration loans have been forced to liquidate their operations for financial reasons. Federal credit programs must be adjusted immediately to prevent additional foreclosures against farm operators who continue to experience temporary financial difficulty through no fault of their own.

Freeing up an additional $250 million under the FmHA economic emergency loan program, as the bill and Conference Report provide for, should help to alleviate some of the credit problems facing farmers across this country; and it is my hope that with this provision, the administration would move to make this money available quickly.

Finally, H.R. 4072 serves as confirmation that the administration has agreed to take certain actions which could expand overseas use of U.S. agricultural products. This export effort by the administration is both welcome and necessary if we are to reverse the recent trend of declining market shares. While it is essential that this dangerous trend be reversed, it must be approached with the utmost care if the United States is to avoid triggering lower commodity prices.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that all concerned—the House, the Senate, and the administration—have acted wisely and fairly from all points of view in bringing this conference report before us, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL).

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I should tell the House that I have tremendous concern. The first concern comes from what I find out in my district. Never since I have been in the Congress have I faced the number of forced farm failures and bankruptcies that we face today.

The second concern I have is what I saw happening in the conference that we recently completed.

In my opinion, a conference committee is supposed to be a committee that meets together to iron out differences and bring about what improvements that you can. For those who were not at the conference committee, let me tell you how it worked. The way it worked, we Members on the House side brought up several proposals in order to improve this legislation. Each time the Senate side asked the Department of Agriculture whether they would agree to our proposal or whether they would not. They did not agree and the Senate then, which was controlled by a majority of Republicans, simply said, "No, we cannot accept it," and it was turned down.

I would feel all right about that if there was any indication that the Department of Agriculture was at all aware of the problem that I see existing out in my part of the country. I detected no concern whatever.

One of the proposals that we had was that our farmers in our area would be permitted to get various deficiency payments so that they could have money to plant their crops, as has been done in the past. The Department of Agriculture turned that down and said we cannot have that, but the Department of Agriculture does support a proposal in the Senate that says for those people who sign up for next year's program, they will get advance payments before this coming election.

Now, I ask the Members of this body and the people of our country to judge just exactly how concerned that Department is over our farmers that are having trouble when they come forth with that sort of proposal. I tell them that farmers need money more urgently at planting time than they do at election time.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. ROBERTS).

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that this is not the best possible bill for all our commodities but it is the best bill possible under difficult circumstances. This is really the culmination of an 18-month effort by those in the wheat country and those of us who are priviledged to represent agriculture, both in the House committee and in the other body, to come up with a wheat program that makes sense and also to achieve some cost savings to the taxpayer and some benefits in regard to our other commodity programs.

In terms of delay, I do not know who I am more upset with or who my farmers are more upset with in this effort. There is, I guess, enough blame to go around for everybody. Perhaps the USDA, or those in the House Agriculture Committee who preferred not to go into this issue last summer and tabled this issue, or those in the Senate who held out for all or nothing at the expense of the wheat producers and other producers.

Let me point out to my colleagues that we are 2 months away from harvest in Kansas. We are weeks away from harvest in Texas. Yet, we still do not know what the 1984 wheat program is going to be.

I challenge anybody in any segment of our total economy to operate under conditions like that.

So we went to conference with a bill that was passed in this body during the last session and passed in the Senate weeks ago. It was a tough conference. There are those who have spoken from the well who have indicated they are not happy with the bill. They say, well, it is just a wheat bill.

Let me point out to those folks that it is in wheat country where we are having a great deal of difficulty. We have a billion-six bushels in terms of a surplus and prices for the third year in a row are below the cost of production, so we do need help. We find ourselves competing with corn as a feed grain and corn representatives should be aware of that competition.

In this regard, I want to disabuse the idea or the notion by some Members in this body that somehow it is a parochial bill being forced down our throats. That is not the case. It does put the 1984 wheat program finally in place and in time for the wheat producers to make some plans. The 1985 program is now locked into place. This business of delay after delay for 3 years is so bad in my country, whether it be the USDA or Members of either side of the aisle, that one farmer told me, "Pat, I don't care what you do to me, just let me know."

It has significant help in regard to the Farmers Home Administration. It has a food-for-peace program that extends to wheat and dairy and it saves the taxpayer $2.5 billion and Agriculture gets rid of a black eye that we have received in the national press due to all these increased program costs. I will not go into all that argument, but at least it is a first step in the right direction in that regard. Most important in high plains wheat country, this bill changes the acreage base to provide long needed equity in summer fallow country. It will be of real benefit.

Now, let me say just one other thing to those who will come and view this bill, quite frankly from corn-colored and political glasses. I have worked with my colleagues on the other side in regard to their problem in corn country. I know you have severe problems; but let me suggest that if you want to wave your banner for whatever reason in describing this bill in political terms that when you wave it you are also planting it in the backs of my Kansas wheat producers. I do not think that is fair or right and moreover I do not think it augurs well for any future farm program that we may have to consider.

In this regard, I urge my colleagues to support the bill, with the idea that in conference from 8 o'clock in the morning until 8 o'clock at night we were able to resolve the difficult differences that we had.

I promise to my colleagues that I will help work in their behalf, in behalf of all agriculture, but I would warn about this business of all or nothing in pitting region against region and commodity against commodity. That does not spell any kind of success for farmers in my country or all across the country.

Mr. Speaker, I also would like to speak in some detail about that section of the bill regarding the expanded food-for-peace program as it applies to wheat and dairy.

Section 502 of the conference report amends section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 by adding a new subsection (b) that provides for the donation of wheat in addition to dairy products to needy persons in foreign countries.

As provided in the original section 416 language, the appropriate interagency decisionmaking body for Public Law 480 will also be the decisionmaking body for expanded section 416 programs. Multiyear donations are now specifically authorized under this amendment.

I am supportive of the conference substitute to section 416 that would permit the sale and barter of commodities and products for needy persons in foreign countries but restricts such sales and barter to those approved by the Secretary of Agriculture for three specified purposes. Also, I am of the opinion that the House conferees are in strong support of the language that provides to "the maximum extent practicable, expedited procedures shall be used in implementing the provisions" of this section 416 program.

Certainly, the current administration of section 416 dairy donations is effective in meeting the goals of this provision. Under this amendment as I view it, the executive branch is to continue its current procedures developed for implementation of section 416. As appropriate, Public Law 480, title II concepts, such as review of storage and distribution capabilities and avoidance of any substantial disincentive to local producers, are to be applied to section 416 programs. If the development of regulations specific to this broadened section 416 program will facilitate such expedited procedures, such regulations should be developed.

The amendment authorizes sales and barter, as approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, of the donated section 416 commodities within the criteria set forth in the amendment. Section 502(b)(1) refers to sales and barter which are incidental to the donations, such as sales of damaged commodities. Section 502(b)(2) is intended to provide for such sales and barter as are necessary to assure delivery of the donated commodities to the needy people; it appears to me that these sales and barter are expected to be primarily of a logistical nature and necessary in order to assure effective consumption of the donated commodities by the intended recipients.

Such sales are expected to be primarily in poor countries where other funds for such purposes are not available. Section 502(b)(3) authorizes such sales and barter of commodities donated to international organizations such as the World Food program in accordance with historical uses of such commodities; for example, dairy commodities donated to the World Food program are traditionally used to support dairy development schemes. Such activities are to be consistent with "normal programing procedures" for purposes of this provision.

The amendment also provides that "no portion of the proceeds or services realized from sales or barter of donated commodities may be used to meet operating and overhead expenses," and I am sure at a minimum that we in the House intend that this include such expenses as lobbying or salaries for personnel or staffs located in the United States.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Cotton, Rice, and Sugar, the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY).

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for yielding me this time.

Let me begin by saying that I am one of those who is not totally happy with this committee farm bill. As we all know, it started out as a wheat bill in the House of Representatives last November and what the Senate sent us last week; also impacting upon feed grains, cotton, and rice, as was the farm credit system.

I think it was unfortunate that the administration chose on the Senate side, the Republican controlled side, not to do what the gentleman from Kansas just alluded to, to treat the various commodities with some degree of equity.

I want to thank my colleagues on both sides of the aisle here in the House for supporting my position in the conference and trying to improve somewhat the posture of the cotton and the rice program. Thanks to your support, we were able to make some contribution to help the cotton farmers and the rice farmers throughout the Nation; but I certainly concur with what the gentleman from Iowa has said. It was not the normal type of conference where you have give and take. Truly, the Department of Agriculture was calling the shots.

I would certainly hope that in the future our conferences with the Senate will involve give and take so that we can adequately reflect the concerns and views of our constituents, the farmers, and arrive at truly consensus legislation.

But in conclusion, I do urge passage of this bill. Although I am not satisfied with it, I think under the circumstances it is probably the best package we can get for the American farmer today.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. ENGLISH), a distinguished member of our committee.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to chart a little of the history that has taken place with regard to this legislation.

The House of Representatives passed this legislation as applied to wheat in November. The other body refused to take it up and, quite frankly, the other body refused to take it up even up until this past month.

Finally, in the middle of the month the other body decided to act.

I think that what has to be understood is the reasoning behind the delay, the foot-dragging that took place. Quite frankly, it came from the opposition, the Department of Agriculture. The Department and the Secretary opposed this legislation up until the point that a number of Senators became concerned about the impact that this was going to have on the elections as far as the farm State areas are concerned.

I know that many people have looked upon this legislation as something that provides great benefit for wheat farmers and there is some benefit this year. But there is a cost and the cost is very heavy.

Before the Secretary of Agriculture would agree to allow this to be taken up in the U.S. Senate he first of all required that there be a reduction in target price, 7 cents for wheat this year and 27 cents next year. And it is through this that the savings that are projected to come about.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this bill can only be looked at as a band-aid, an election year band-aid at that, something to simply get us by. But I have to say my wheat farmers are in terrible condition. They need assistance, and they have got to get by this year before they can worry about surviving next year. And I have to say that question is very much in doubt.

I think in the end that this bill has to be viewed from the standpoint of Senator NICKLES. Our Oklahoma Senator was observing the discussions taking place in the other body and he asked why they were having advanced payments. And one of the Senators turned around and said "Elections."

I think that that pretty much sums it up. This bill is to help as far as this election year, but it does so at the cost of next year, and I think that we should keep that in mind.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN), a distinguished subcommittee chairman.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, I echo the sayings of my colleague from Iowa, Congressman BEDELL, and others who have termed this bill a cruel hoax on the farmers of America. I especially want to echo my colleague from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL) on the attitude of the Senate conferees.

Their attitude when they came in was "take it or leave it. You either take exactly what we have, jot and tittle, or nothing else." There was no give and take in the conference committee, absolutely none.

We were elected by our constituents to come here and to legislate in the best way that we know how. Part of that process is to go into conference and to work out our differences. We had differences, but the other body refused to accept any of the differences that we had with them.

Instead, they told us that what they had was what we had to take. And there was a letter on White House stationery, not signed by the President, but signed by David Stockman and Secretary Block, saying that no changes would be accepted.

That is no way to legislate around here, unless you just want to be dictated to by the White House or David Stockman.

Let me make it very clear. I have nothing against the provisions in this bill dealing with wheat. I have nothing against the provisions dealing with rice or with cotton. That is why I will probably hold my nose and vote for it.

But what galls me about this bill is that there is not one single thing in this bill that is going to help our Iowa farmers right now, this time of year, when they need it. Not one thing. There is not one thing in this bill that will put a dollar in my farmers' pockets this month when they need it.

Right now almost half of our Iowa farmers do not have credit lined up to put their crop in the ground this year. This bill will not provide them a cent.

Now, there is money in there for advanced diversion payments for people in the wheat country, but there is nothing in there to give advanced deficiency payments for our corn farmers right now, when they most need some working capital.

I do not want to be in a position, as one gentleman said, of dividing and splitting the farm sector up. That was not my intent. We passed a wheat bill here last November. It was not this body that sat on that bill for 4 or 5 months; it was the other body that sat on it. It was the other body that opened up this bill and made it a "mini farm bill."

Fine, but if they are going to do that then let us be fair to all sectors of agriculture.

I offered a series of amendments in conference committee, in good faith, hoping that we would have some sense on the Senate side of fairness, to treat the commodities fairly and to treat areas of the country fairly. But, instead, we ran into a brick wall of the majority party in the Senate saying "no" to any amendments at all.

I offered an amendment to have advanced deficiency payments right now for our corn farmers, to give them cash now. It was defeated by one vote in conference on the Senate side, not the House side.

On haying and grazing, I offered an amendment to not have any haying or grazing anywhere. That was defeated.

So I offered an amendment to allow haying and grazing on our corn set-aside; I offered an amendment to allow haying and grazing on all set-aside acres, not just wheat but also corn. That was also defeated.

So I do have a beef about this bill, because there is no more beef in our feed lots in Iowa. Our beef is going down to wheat country, not because of any inherent advantages that they have but because this Congress is skewing the economic structure of cattle feeding. Why should not our cattlemen be allowed to graze on hay set-aside acres like the farmers down South?

I do not care if the wheat people have haying and grazing, if all areas have it also. Let us make the playing field level in this country for all of our farmers.

I just hope that the people in this body will take a look at two items. First, the front page of the Midwest Messenger serving Nebraska and Iowa, January 14 of this year, on the front page there are 10 farms for sale in January. March 17, 2 months later, there are 104 farms on the same front page of this paper for sale. That is what happened in just the last 2 or 3 months, and there is nothing in this bill that is going to stop it at this time.

I just want to alert the Members that this bill is a cruel hoax on our farmers, if what you're trying to tell them is that help is on its way with this bill.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Nebraska (Mrs. SMITH).

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. I thank the gentleman for yielding and I rise in support of H.R. 4072, the Agricultural Programs Adjustment Act conference report.

I would like to commend the chairman, KIKA DE LA GARZA, and the ranking minority member, EDWARD MADIGAN, for their leadership in finally bringing this needed legislation to the floor.

The bill is not perfect—no piece of legislation is—especially farm legislation. However, it is an improvement for our wheat producers, not as much as I would like, but an improvement just the same. Unfortunately, politics enters into everything in an election year and farm legislation and farm and ranch issues are always an inviting topic for political wheeling and dealing.

For example, critics of this bill who have some legitimate concerns, are lambasting it as a giant cut in agricultural price supports and that farmers are going to be worse off with it than without it. Other critics take a different line of attack. They say the bill is just an election year sweetener to gain farm votes before the election. For the life of me, I cannot figure out how it can be both a sweetener and a cut at the same time.

At any rate, the farmers out there can hardly get a word in edgewise on the issue. They are being drowned out by the politicians. However, I do listen to what the producers say and I can tell this body that the producers who have contracted me are in favor of this legislation.

They say that even though they are giving up a little on target prices, they will gain even more back on the new diversion-payment provision in the bill. Wheat producers favor the diversion payment and the increase PIK payment rate, advance deficiency payments, and the the haying and grazing option. They especially like the idea of a 2-year program. For years, winter wheat producers have not had a program announced in time for them to make a decision before planting time in the early fall and late summer. With this bill, they already know the basics of the 1985 program and can plan around it as they need to.

The National and Nebraska Associations of Corn Growers support the bill. They will have no changes in the 1984 program, but will have a paid diversion program in 1985 if carryover stocks exceed 1.1 billion bushels.

Producers of all commodities are pleased that the administration has agreed to significant increases in export credit. When demand is slack and developing countries have very little hard currency, the name of the game, if you want to sell, is credit.

In agreeing to support this measure, the administration has promised to increase Public Law 480 food for peace programs by 18 percent, direct credit programs by 75 percent, and loan guarantees by 23 percent. Altogether, export assistance will be increased by $2.075 billion over 2 years.

I am particularly pleased that the administration has already carried through on their agreement, as part of this bill, to release an additional $250 million in Farmers Home Administration direct economic emergency loans. There are many other FmHA provisions that should help hard-pressed family farmers and ranchers through these troubled times.

Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, this bill will help some—but is not the answer to agriculture's problems. The overwhelming problem that farmers and ranchers have today is high interest rates. They have become the No. 1 production expense for many producers. They are too high for current commodity prices and are directly responsible for the erosion of farmland values and the ruination of many good farm and ranch families.

Until Congress, the administration, and the people of this country decide what they want from Government and then pay for it without borrowing, high interest rates will persist and more families will leave agriculture.

Further, high interest rates, caused by a growing Federal deficit, are partially responsible for the drop in farm exports—further exacerbating the supply-demand imbalance.

This legislation is also a continuation of the long U.S. policy of trying to unilaterally correct the world grain situation. Past experience has shown that every time we cut production, other competitors increase their production to take up the slack. We need to move toward a demand-based program rather than a supply-based program.

These broader issues will be discussed in the 1985 farm bill, but they are important to keep in mind as we vote on this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this measure and yield the balance of my time.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from South Dakota (Mr. DASCHLE).

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Speaker, I cast my vote for H.R. 4072 very, very reluctantly.

It is better than nothing, but it is next to nothing when placed beside the desperate situation of family agriculture in my part of the country.

If this legislation does nothing else I hope it will spotlight for us the crying need for a fundamental revision of our basic farm legislation in 1985.

We must stop these feeble last-minute efforts to tinker with programs that fail to meet the needs of our farmers.

We must put an end to programs that insult our taxpayers with their cost and our family farmers with their gross favoritism for huge corporate operations.

A responsible overhaul of the farm program for 1985 must include a targeting of assistance toward real farmers, not corporate and tax-dodge intruders. It must focus on the bottom line, price. It must recognize that only integrated corporations and tax evaders masquerading as farmers can produce at prices below the cost of production and must smooth price swings so truly competitive family operators are not driven from the land.

The legislation we adopt today does none of these things. It represents tinkering at the margins with a basically inadequate price structure.

In 1985 the approach represented by this bill must be replaced. If it is not, we will find family agriculture replaced by a system that will trade the competitive food prices Americans have enjoyed for a century with the kind of price gouging they have seen in oil, natural gas, and other noncompetitive industries in recent years.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from North Dakota (Mr. DORGAN).

Mr. DORGAN. I thank the chairman for yielding.

I intend to support this conference report. I think it does improve slightly the 1984 wheat program.

The paid diversion I think is important. But I do not think anybody in this Chamber ought to be fooled. We still do not have a decent farm program in this country and it is pretty much of the same old story, a teaspoon of help for the little guy and a barrel of help for the big agrofactories in America.

It is interesting to me that the question of priorities is never discussed much. If the big banks on the east coast have a headache, we have people rushing to the public medicine chest to try to help them. If Argentina cannot pay its debt then they will spend all weekend, stay up all night, to figure out how to help them pay it.

If the farmer is crying, they act like they cannot hear or see. They drag their feet and they say, "We cannot afford it."

Well, we can afford it. It is just a question of priorities.

We can come up with a better farm bill. This is not a good excuse for a farm bill.

I am going to support it because it is better than the 1984 program, but we need a consistent, a predictable, and a decent farm program that focuses on the needs of the family farmers in this country. That is what built ultimately a strong America.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON).

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the Speaker.

I just wanted to make two points. In the Indianapolis Star yesterday, they pointed out some information on farm foreclosures which affect farmers all across this country. As a matter of fact, the Farmers Home Administration spokesman, Joseph O'Neill said 41 percent of the agency's 263,000 borrowers are behind in their payments and thousands could lose their farms this year especially if the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals lifts the lower court order staying foreclosures in some States.

A spot check showed some 700 farmers face foreclosure in Georgia, 53 in Indiana, 122 in Alabama. North Dakota officials estimate 300 farmers would go out of business this year; Nebraska, 1,157 farmers are in a seriously delinquent state; and in Mississippi there are 89 people who owe Farmers Home Administration $1 million apiece. Also in Mississippi 8,000 farmers are behind in their payments.

So, we have real problems that need to be addressed in the area of farm foreclosures, otherwise we are going to have a lot of small family farmers going out of business this year.

One other point I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, last year when the farm bill came up I introduced an amendment which would mandate that those who were getting free cheese under the cheese program would have to prove that they were needy by giving some kind of a certificate or coupon in order to get the cheese.

Another article that was on the front page of the Indianapolis Star this week pointed out that hundreds of people who have been getting free cheese, and it was a front page headline story; had been hawking this free cheese to businessmen, service stations, restaurants, lounges, so forth, at about 50 cents a pound, 50 cents a pound.

Now I would like to point out to the committee that this is causing commercial cheese sales in this country to plummet. About 2 years ago commercial cheese sales had increased by about 6 percent. Last year they had decreased by 10.3 percent, a 16.3-percent drop in about 18 months.

And they are going down even more rapidly right now because the problem is escalating. Thousands across America are taking advantage of the cheese giveaway by selling it illegally to people who normally would buy cheese in the normal retail stores and wholesale stores.

And as a result, commercial cheese sales are going down. And the Federal Government is then buying this surplus cheese from the commercial dealers who cannot sell it on the open market because of the giveaway program.

We need to address this issue. We did not do it last year and it appears as though we are not going to do it this year. But I submit to those on the Committee on Agriculture we really need to pay attention to it now, because it is a vicious circle that is going to continue, and will get bigger and bigger until the Federal Government is going to buy so much cheese that they will probably sink under the weight of it.

Thank you; I wanted to make those two points.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes to reply to the preceding speaker, the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON).

First, this legislation does not deal with the domestic dairy program or the cheese giveaway.

Second, the gentleman's complaint is raised about an unlegislatable issue which is the human element. We can legislate until the end of time and there will be the person who cheats, the person who lies, the person who does not abide by the law.

Third, we did have an attempt last year in the dairy compromise legislation to try and reduce production. It is working. We are reducing production. The farmers, themselves, are paying into a fund used to pay for the reduction. So it is not like nothing has been done.

We are working on it. Do not confuse the issue; this bill does not relate to any of the items the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BURTON) mentioned.

As I have said, there is the human element; every law will be broken by someone, some day, somewhere, some time.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I thank the chairman.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask one question and that is: The fraud goes on; we know it goes on. What we tried to do last year with my amendment was to tighten down by saying that the only people who could get cheese under the cheese giveaway would be those who could present evidence that they were entitled to it.

My question to you is, Will the Committee on Agriculture address that issue this year?

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Yes, we will be happy to; whenever we have legislative hearings in that area we will be very happy to listen to the gentleman and work with him to the extent possible.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH).

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this bill went through here last fall as a moderately bad 1-year wheat bill. I was willing to do most anything for 1 year to help most anybody in the farm sector. But it has come back as a 2-year hoax.

The problem grain we have in this country is wheat. This bill uses Government incentives to go exactly in the wrong directions. We encourage more production of wheat compared to other grains instead of less.

Normally the relationship is that wheat is 80 percent of the price of corn. Right now it is almost equal.

If you are only going to have a 1- or 2-year bill, your price relationships ought to be almost equal in order to help wheat get out of the problem. But instead of that we have an almost 50 percent higher target price and loan rate for wheat in this bill. That is not the right way to do it.

I say it is a hoax because we are being told here today and some of the Members from the cities that do not know much about this who want to give us a vote once in a while are going to think they voted for something here.

This is no substitute for next year's 4-year bill. We need to have a good bill next year.

Some people will think when they vote for this they will have voted to help the farmer. When as a matter of fact, they did not.

In addition to that, they added this grazing section. You can get 85 percent PIK graze, you are better off on the diverted acres and the grazed acres and the PIK acres than on the acres that they grow for wheat.

Now what kind of an adjustment program is that? If you are going to have an adjustment program, you ought to have some adjustment.

In the long run it may help somebody for 1 year if he is going to get out of farming after the end of this year. But if he is going to be farming in 1985, 1986, 1987, this is going to be harmful instead of good.

The wheat people have been coming in here year after year wanting some advantages that in the end, and history will show this, they would have been better off if they did not try to get those advantages.

You have to have adjustment programs that really adjust or else it will not work.

I say this bill is no substitute for a good, 4-year bill next year and let nobody think when they vote for this, they are really doing something for the farm sector in this country.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Texas (Mr. STENHOLM).

Mr. STENHOLM. I thank the chairman for yielding.

I must say in all due respect to the last gentleman who spoke, Mr. NEAL SMITH of Iowa, that even though many of the points he makes could be substantiated, the fact is this is still a wheat corrective bill. At least in the part of the country where I come from, where we do have severe problems with overproduction of wheat, this bill does offer some slight hope, slight but it is also doable, to do something about the surplus conditions of wheat.

It is not a perfect bill by any stretch of the imagination; no one would contend that. But this is April 3. We do begin harvest in Texas in about a month. Time has run out.

It does, the bill does do some positive things in allowing us to bring the overproduction of wheat under control. We do it within the confines of the budget which we are going to spend a lot of time talking about over the next 3 days here on the floor of the House.

I think when you get right down to it, most of us from farm country do not like a lot of the things that are in this legislation. We do wish that we could legislate in a more timely manner. I think our farmers do hope that we can do this.

Once again we have not done it. But the bottom line is this bill today is the best we could do under the circumstances. It is fiscally responsible. It does attack the main problem and that is the one we have with wheat.

And on balance, I would urge the Members to support this bill.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SLATTERY).

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 4072, the Agricultural Programs Adjustment Act. While far from perfect, this legislation contains much-needed changes in farm programs for 1984 and 1985.

This conference report is the result of a long and difficult process that began nearly 16 months ago. Passage of this compromise legislation is a sign that Congress has the determination to work out an agreement on a farm bill.

The conference agreement is a prelude to next year when Congress can develop and pass what I hope will be a new and more long-term farm bill.

In the meantime, I would submit that the best thing the Federal Government can do for rural America is reduce the Federal deficit. Before the Government can do something for rural America, it must stop clobbering farmers with what I call a triple whammy.

High deficits cause high interest rates. The first punch farmers encounter is at their local bank when they face intolerable interest rates for loans to operate their farm or to make necessary repairs.

The second slap in the triple whammy is the overvalued dollar on the world market. High interest rates in the United States attract overseas investors. The result is an overvalued dollar on the world market. In effect, the overvaluation creates a hidden tax on our farm exports, making them more expensive to our agricultural customers. Competitors can easily step in and underbid our farm export prices.

The final blow in the triple whammy is the declining value of agricultural land. A lot of farmland in my northeast Kansas district is beginning to decline in value because nobody can afford to pay the 10- to 15-percent interest rates created by the Federal deficit.

Sustained lower interest rates are the key to a rebound in the distressed farm economy.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. EVANS).

Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report.

Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference committee report on H.R. 4072, the Wheat Improvement Act. I had the honor to serve as the only new Member of Congress on the committee which considered one of the most important pieces of farm legislation to come before the 98th Congress. This measure rectifies some of the problems with our current farm programs, and it will be in effect until Congress passes a new, multiyear farm bill next year.

The bill I signed as a conferee is not perfect. During the negotiation process, I and several members of the conference committee expressed reservations about some of the matters which the bill left unaddressed. However, we are rapidly approaching the point in the cultivation season after which no farm program bill, no matter how generous, could help our farmers. Compromise and quick action were necessary, and led to this agreement among major farm organizations, Members of both parties in the Senate and the House, and the administration.

The major provisions of this bill provide for target price freezes and paid diversion programs for commodities, export assistance to help develop U.S. agricultural export markets, and some vital emergency credit provisions for hardpressed farmers. These provisions will begin the necessary process of addressing the desperate situation in which our agricultural community finds itself. It is also important to note that this compromise will yield a projected savings to the U.S. taxpayers of $2.5 billion.

Among the provisions in the report is one particularly important to farmers in Illinois. That is the section which deals with conflicts of interest in the review and action on Farmers Home Administration loans. Those involved in reviewing FmHA loan applications were in a postion to enjoy an unfair advantage in purchasing farmland. The new conflict of interest provision in the statutes makes it illegal for such advantages to be acted upon. Such a provision is especially important in these difficult economic times when financially strapped farmers are particularly vulnerable.

Again, while this conference report is not ideal, it does stand as an example of compromise and of our legislative process at work.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri (Mr. COLEMAN).

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report.

I would like to point out that several items that are in this conference report were part of the original legislation that passed this House some months ago in H.R. 1190, sponsored by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. JONES) and myself.

Specifically, we point out in the conference report that there is a doubling of loan limits for operating loans for Farmers Home Administration loans, which I think is important to meet the new demands placed upon America's farmers today.

For many months, in fact years, we have been requesting that the administration support some sort of economic emergency direct loans. These are loans which are directly given to farmers. And the administration was very reluctant.

We finally got them to agree in this compromise to support $310 million in direct insured loans, which I think are much needed, certainly in my part as well as other parts, of the country.

We see that a specific example taken from the earlier bill, of H.R. 1190, in this conference report is the option taking of the lower of the interest rate for loans that are rescheduled or reamortized. Under this provision either the interest rate of the loan originally entered into or the rate of the rescheduled or reamortized loan, whichever is lower is applicable. So we are directing this action in favor of the farmer. And also recognizing the farmers have a cash-flow problem we provide for a stretchout in their repayment periods from 7 to 15 years.

All of these, I think, are responsible positions. They are contained in the conference report and were contained in the original bill (H.R. 1190) which passed this House by an overwhelming majority some months ago.

I want to congratulate the conferees and also the administration for listening to, and responding to, the mixed cries of hope and despair that are out there in rural America. I think it is going to be of help to farmers. It is not going to be a panacea, but it is going to be of some help. Also I recognize that the administration has moved to assist in export credit programs in supporting this legislation. You might have a willing buyer and a willing seller of farm commodities, but if you do not have the financing package you very well might lose that sale to the Europeans or some other grain-producing country that is our competitor in the world markets.

I am very happy about the recognition that export credit programs do work, can work, and will increase our sales abroad.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. I yield to the ranking Republican on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN).

Mr. MADIGAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

With regard to the provisions contained in this conference report to which the gentleman just referred, are those provisions advantageous and available to all farmers or would they only be advantageous and available to the wheat farmers in Kansas?

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. No; these are items which would be across-the-board advantageous to all commodity producers in this country. This is much more than just a wheat bill now. This is an all encompassing bill that impacts favorably on people in northern Missouri and certainly southern Iowa and places where the drought has hit, as well as throughout the rest of the Nation on both coasts and all commodities. As far as I can see, most farmers are going to be assisted in some way, because these loan provisions alone are going to go to any farmer, as long as he qualifies. And there is not any sort of distinction as to what part of the country he comes from or what commodity he might be growing.

Mr. MADIGAN. I thank the gentleman for his answer.

And if the gentleman would yield further, with regard to the provisions in this bill that deal with our expanding our ability to export agricultural commodities, to the gentleman's knowledge is there any provision in this bill that would restrict those exports to wheat?

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. No; none whatsoever. In fact, I do not grow a whole lot of wheat in my district and I am encouraged that the soybean and corn producers in this country will be able to export their product even more successfully because of the additional export financing that is provided for in this measure.

Mr. MADIGAN. I thank the gentleman for clarifying what is really contained in the bill.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this conference report. I want to compliment the conferees and, especially, the chairman of the Agriculture Committee for their hard work in bringing this legislation to the floor. We began this process last year when the House passed a bill designed to provide a better farm program for a single commodity. Today, after months of discussion and negotiation in the other body and in conference, we bring to the floor a bill that will provide much needed relief for farmers. The bill will strengthen our agricultural export programs, assist cash-strapped farmers and make needed changes in farm credit programs.

Mr. Speaker, this is the single most important piece of agriculture legislation the House will consider this session. The administration supports this legislation, and it has wide bipartisan support both inside and outside the agriculture community. The Congress has managed to help farmers, provide a potential boost for our sagging international balance of payments and begin the assault on the Federal deficit in a single piece of legislation. This is a job well done. I, therefore urge my colleagues to support the conference report.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. ALBOSTA), a very valued Member of the House relating to agriculture.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, I would just like to briefly state my concerns about the direction I believe agriculture is going in. And I think it is totally wrong.

I think what we ought to be doing is setting up a two-price system in this country where the Secretary of Agriculture, when he sees too much production, would be able to set aside a certain amount of that production for another use such as for energy consumption. There is not any reason in the world why we cannot have a renewable source of energy for alcohol production in the country and use the feed grains, and the wheat for that production, and the remaining protein for export and for human consumption and animal feed.

Every farmer ought to be willing to be involved in that. I think that is the type of proposal that has to move forward.

At the same time, this country should be aggressively bartering our surplus agriculture production for strategic materials and minerals that the Defense Department needs to strengthen our national security. Bartering can also take place for the oil that the Government is currently purchasing with dollars to go into the strategic petroleum reserve. The point is that there are many countries in the world who have these important resources but don't have the cash to purchase the food they need to feed their people. A barter system or program is an effective solution to this problem and will not waste taxpayers' money on endless storage costs for huge grain supplies that can only depress the market further for the farmer.

The 1980's call for new approaches to American agriculture. Just as the Roosevelt administration and Congress in the 1930's authored new and effective farm programs that have allowed American agriculture to become extremely productive, so must the leadership within the Federal Government now come together to pass a new farm program that will use rather than waste one of America's most precious resources, our food production. This is the direction the 1985 farm bill and other farm legislation this and future sessions of Congress will consider must take if we are to have an effective farm program that will relieve the taxpayer of the large Federal payments that have taken place in recent years to run USDA farm programs.

The bill we are considering today, H.R. 4072, the Agricultural Programs Adjustment Act, has some good parts. The $150 million increase in the food-for-peace program and the $100 million increase for export credit programs operated by USDA are urgently needed to promote the sale and disposal of grain abroad. The emergency farm loan funds are also very important to many farmers around the country.

Unfortunately the bill also freezes target prices for 1984 and 1985 for wheat and feed grains, a move that will not help farmers in Michigan and which I strongly believe is the wrong approach to take. That is why I am reluctantly supporting this legislation because I believe we need the export promotion and farm loan parts of the bill and this is probably the only chance to get these programs passed in time to be effective in 1984.

I hope however in the future that more comprehensive, creative and effective farm legislation will be up before the House, so we will not have to consider stopgap bills and farmers will not see agriculture policy change from year to year.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, let me inform the House the Senate has already adopted this conference last night on a voice vote.

Should we not adopt it, we would have to start all over again with the House, with the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, this bill includes wheat, corn, feed grains, cotton, rice, agricultural credit, agricultural exports, export credit, and foreign donations; it has consumer protection, stability for the consumer, hopefully stability for the farmer.

I agree with everything that has been said pro and con here this afternoon. My only caveat is that this is the best we could do. This is the only thing we had the votes for. If you do not have the votes, you are not going to get what you want. This is the final version. This is the final vote. We did what we could. We brought you what was possible—within the art of the possible. I think at least that should merit your support.

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my support for H.R. 4072 and extend my congratulations to the conferees for their prompt consideration of this much-needed legislation.

The additional money provided for direct economic emergency loans, the increased ceilings on both direct and guaranteed operating loans, and the revised eligibility standards for natural disaster loans will all benefit our Nation's farmers—particularly as we enter planting season in many areas of our country.

I would also like to make a few observations concerning the section 416 dairy donations program and the modifications made in it by H.R. 4072.

It seems to me that USDA deserves our appreciation for its implementation of this new program, particularly for the development of expedited procedures and a memorandum of understanding with the Agency for International Development. Because of these actions, almost 90,000 metric tons of surplus Government stocks of dairy products were donated to feed the hungry of the world last year and 100,000 metric tons are expected to be committed this year.

It is fitting that these expedited procedures be incorporated into the law for they will neither adversely affect nor change the current practical working relationships in the section 416 program. Rather, I expect that they will simply be adopted into the existing delivery system and, thus, serve to continue and enhance our commitment to donating significant quantities of our surplus dairy and, now, wheat commodities to needy people throughout the world.

I urge my colleagues to support the conference report.●

● Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, it is important to point out, at this time, that H.R. 4072 is a necessary piece of legislation, and although I and other farm State members may disagree with individual provisions in the bill, the time has come for us to put aside our minor grievances and do what is best for American agriculture. The time has come to abandon partisan politics and disunity—it is that type of action that weakens agriculture's voice at the national level.

Many individuals and groups have worked to form this compromise package which, overall, represents an improvement over the originally discussed package. It is for that reason that I lend my support to this legislation, and I urge my colleagues to do so as well.●

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, while I am not completely satisfied with the conference report on H.R. 4072, I will vote for its passage.

I consider the farm program provisions in the conference report on H.R. 4072 to be at least preferable to those announced by the administration. H.R. 4072 will provide better incentives to increase farmer participation in the various agricultural programs. Moreover, it includes a number of farm credit improvements that were contained in H.R. 1190 which the House passed on May 4, 1983, and also a number of provisions that will increase farm exports.

I am disappointed that the Senate conferees rejected the amendments which my distinguished colleagues from Iowa (Mr. HARKIN) had offered during the House-Senate conference committee meeting on March 29. One of the amendments would have permitted farmers to receive one-half of their deficiency payments in advance. These are payments that the farmers who choose to participate in the various farm programs will receive anyway. It would have provided them with cash this spring—cash to buy seed and fertilizer. Moreover, it would have increased participation in the programs without substantially increasing the cost to the Government. As the sponsor of legislation to provide advance deficiency payments to farmers who have been the victims of natural disasters, I know how beneficial advance payments can be to farmers who do not have the necessary cash on hand to plant crops.

Another amendment would have permitted farmers to borrow approximately 30 percent more money under the FmHA emergency disaster loan program by requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to use the higher commodity price when calculating the value of production loss. Emergency disaster loans carry a 5 percent interest rate. That amendment would have benefited farmers throughout the country whose crops have failed because of very poor weather conditions. Farmers in the northwestern section of my State desperately needed such assistance. Many of the counties in that part of Minnesota have been plagued with poor weather for over 2 years. That extra borrowing capacity would have helped these farmers return their operations to financial solvency. Disaster loans are not loans to inefficient producers, rather they are loans to farmers who have been victims of circumstances beyond their control.

Many hardpressed farmers will benefit, however, from the domestic credit provisions which have been included in this legislation. Among these provisions is an increase in funding for the direct, insured loan component of the economic emergency loan program. Although the $253 million increase does not reach historical levels, it is better than what the Office of Management and Budget had allocated for this program. In January, the Office of Management and Budget completely reversed previous policy and contravened congressional intent by allocating only $50 million to the direct, insured loan component of the program.

Overall, this legislation will provide farmers with more assistance than they are presently receiving. It is important that we give farmers the opportunity to sign up for participation in the farm programs and allow them to take advantage of the improved farm credit programs as soon as possible.●

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 379, nays 11, not voting 42, as follows:

Mr. HUGHES and Mr. RUSSO changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. RALPH M. HALL and Mr. MCNULTY changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the conference report was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair will now put the question on the motion on which the proceedings were postponed on Monday, April 2, 1984, and then the question on the motion on which further proceedings were postponed earlier today.

Votes will be taken in the following order: H.R. 4707, on which the yeas and nays are ordered; and H.R. 5026 de novo.

The Chair will reduce to 5 minutes the time for any electronic votes after the first such vote in this series.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report on H.R. 4072 just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 473

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed from the list of cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 473.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

ARIZONA WILDERNESS ACT OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unfinished business is the question of suspending the rules and passing the bill, H.R. 4707, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCNULTY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4707, as amended, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the temporary extension of the ban on credit card surcharges."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably not able to be here at the time of the vote on H.R. 5026, the Truth in Lending Act amendment.

Had I been present, I would have voted "yea."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I inadvertently missed rollcall No. 64 on H.R. 5026, the Annunzio bill extending the ban on credit card surcharges inasmuch as I was in a committee hearing at the time and neglected to vote.

I would like the RECORD to reflect that had I been here for that vote, I would have voted "yea."

EDUCATION DAY, U.S.A.

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 520) designating April 13, 1984, as "Education Day, U.S.A.", and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 520 to designate April 13, 1984, as "Education Day, U.S.A."

The quality of education is essential to America's heritage of political freedom and cultural achievements. Our schools are vital in that they provide for our technical and scientific competence. Education holds the key to the future of our countries higher education goals; and by designating April 13 as "Education Day, U.S.A." We call to the attention of the American people the necessity of continuing to maintain and improve our educational system.

I feel that in the future our Nation must rely more and more on a highly educated citizenry to compete with other nations of the world; therefore, we must nurture our desire for learning to motivate students and teachers to assure the leadership necessary to American democracy.

In this resolution we call attention to the Lubavitch movement which promoted many of the ethical values and principles upon which our great Nation was founded. It is only fitting that in choosing this date we honor the leader of the Lubavitch movement, Rabbi Menachem Mendell Scheerson, whose 82d birthday falls on April 13.

I strongly urge the passage of the resolution which focuses attention on America's educational that is so vital to our future competitiveness with other nations.

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I yield to the distinguished minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words about House Joint Resolution 520, requesting the President to designate April 13, 1984, as "Education Day, U.S.A."

Along with the distinguished majority leader, Mr. WRIGHT, I am a cosponsor of this resolution. I think it is fitting that the majority and minority leader should cosponsor such a resolution because it deals with a subject that transcends partisan consideration.

Education has long been considered a vital part of the American experience. Somewhere along the way, however, we lost the commitment to education. We saw declining test scores and loss of confidence in our schools.

In recent years we have begun to rediscover education's essential importance to our national well-being. We are seeing a rebirth of the old American idea of progress through education for all Americans.

April 13 also happens to be the 82d birthday of a remarkable religious leader, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. He is the internationally renowned and respected leader of the Lubavitch movement which actively promotes education programs at more than 60 centers in 28 States.

So in honoring the concept of American education, we are also paying tribute to the leader of a movement which has contributed so much to education in America.

The Lubavitch movement, founded in the 18th century, has as its philosophical foundation three basic elements—wisdom, understanding, and knowledge.

It is therefore appropriate that the movement, under the inspired leader of the man called the Rebbe, has been so active in promoting education.

Since the word "education" is so all encompassing, it might be useful to look at the language of our resolution so as to better define what we mean when we use the word.

The first thing we see in our resolution is reference to "ethical values and principles." I think these words are of extreme importance because they remind us that education is not limited to mere intellectual, technical, or vocational development but, instead, embraces man's spiritual life as well.

As the resolution reminds us "the Lubavitch movement has fostered and promoted these ethical values and principles throughout the world."

So when we talk about education in this resolution we are talking about all the qualities that go into shaping our mind and our characters.

The movement which the Rebbe heads takes its name from a Russian city, Lubavitch, which, translated into English means "City of Love."

In the final analysis it is love—love of children, love of one's religious heritage, love of learning—that is at the heart of the Lubavitch movement and at the heart of our resolution.

I want to thank everyone connected with this resolution for this chance to say a few words about an important topic and a great man.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I, too, join with the gentleman in commemorating Education Day U.S.A. It is a worthy resolution.

● Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that our distinguished colleague, the minority leader, has joined me in sponsoring Joint Resolution 520, requesting the President to designate April 13, 1984, as "Education Day, U.S.A."

This resolution should pass the House unanimously, Mr. Speaker, because it declares with clarity the importance of education to the well-being of the entire Nation. Moreover, the resolution recognizes the historical tradition of ethical values which are the basis of civilized society and upon which our great Nation was founded.

April 13, 1984, is a particularly significant date because it is the 82d birthday of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the esteemed leader of the Lubavitch movement. This movement actively promotes educational programs in 60 centers in 28 States.

There is a renewal of national concern about educational excellence and a growing awareness across America that education represents an investment in our Nation's future. The resolution under consideration emphasizes the interconnection, indeed the symbiotic relationship, between education on the one hand, and ethical values on the other. In this regard, the Lubavitch movement stands alone as a source of inspiration throughout the world because it is the unquestioned champion of ethical values and principles and educational excellence. Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, as the leader of this movement, deserves the recognition and the praise of this House for his tireless leadership.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I urge all Members to support this resolution. By so doing they will strike a blow for enlightenment and for those values which must be strengthened and nurtured within civilized society.●

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my strong support of House Joint Resolution 520 which requests President Reagan to designate April 13, 1984, as "Education Day, U.S.A."

It is quite fitting that the topic of education be honored on this day, for April 13 is also the 83d birthday of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. He is the respected and revered leader of the Lubavitch movement, an educational movement that has fostered and promoted ethical values and principles at more than 60 centers in 28 States worldwide. This legislation is a tribute to the Lubavitch movement's commitment to the education of our society.

The proper education of our society is the bedrock of our civilized Nation. A strong knowledge of world history and ethical and moral values is essential to the establishment of a stable society. Studies have shown that the more educated a person is, the more that person is adaptable to new ideas. In a constantly changing world it is important to be flexible. However, as the Lubavitch movement professes, it is even more important to have strong ethical and moral values on which to base these changes. For education provides the opportunity to explore new points of view, but in the moral and ethical context of one's character.

Today, more than ever, the education standards for our children's schools must meet the challenges of a rapidly changing sophisticated, and technological world American elementary schools and universities must provide the educational tools, funds, opportunities, and faculty to keep pace with the advances of our time.

Yet, with this challenge comes the responsibility to teach about the history of our society in order to provide a framework in which the student can learn from the past to understand the present and, thus, plan for the future.

Education is the key to a civilized society. We must make certain that the quality of education, both for our children and society at large, is of the highest quality and available to all to reap the benefits from.

It is in this light that I strongly urge my colleagues to join in staunch support of House Joint Resolution 520.●

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 520

Whereas Congress recognizes the historical tradition of ethical values and principles which are the basis of civilized society and upon which our great Nation was founded;

Whereas these ethical values and principles have been the bedrock of society from the dawn of civilization, when they were known as the Seven Noahide Laws;

Whereas without these ethical values and principles the edifice of civilization stands in serious peril of returning to chaos;

Whereas society is profoundly concerned with the recent weakening of these principles that has resulted in crises that beleaguer and threaten the fabric of civilized society;

Whereas the justified preoccupation with these crises must not let the citizens of this Nation lose sight of their responsibility to transmit these historical ethical values from our distinguished past to the generations of the future;

Whereas the Lubavitch movement has fostered and promoted these ethical values and principles throughout the world;

Whereas Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson is the universally respected and revered leader of the Lubavitch movement, and his eighty-second birthday falls on April 13, 1984: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That April 13, 1984, the birthday of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, leader and head of the worldwide Lubavitch movement, is designated as "Education Day, U.S.A.". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL TUBEROUS SCLEROSIS WEEK

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 148) to designate the week of May 6, 1984, through May 13, 1984, as "National Tuberous Sclerosis Week," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object, but I take this time to say that this is a worthwhile resolution and I urge that the body vote in favor of it.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 148

Whereas tuberous sclerosis (hereafter in this joint resolution referred to as "TS") is a genetic disorder affecting as many as one in ten thousand Americans;

Whereas TS remains poorly understood and frequently misdiagnosed even though it is one of the more common genetic disorders;

Whereas TS affects both males and females and individuals of all races;

Whereas characteristics of TS include skin markings, seizures, motor difficulties, mental retardation, tumors of the brain and other organs, and behavioral abnormalities;

Whereas in any individual, the disease features and severity may vary from mild, when patients can live normal lives, to extreme, when TS is disabling and may be life threatening;

Whereas modern research technology has increased the knowledge of TS, there remains much to be learned;

Whereas only with continued, extensive research is there any chance of conquering this horrifying disease; and

Whereas establishing a National Tuberous Sclerosis Week would serve to increase public awareness of TS and stimulate research: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of May 6, 1984, through May 13, 1984, is designated as "National Tuberous Sclerosis

Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe the week with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Indiana (Mrs. HALL) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DONNELLY).

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, tuberous sclerosis is one of the most common severe genetic diseases.

It was first identified more than a century ago. It is thought to afflict as many as 1 in every 5,000 people. It can cause mental retardation, epilepsy, developmental delay, and other handicaps.

Still, there has been relatively little sustained research and even less public awareness of this devastating disorder.

We have begun to reverse that trend only recently.

Researchers from across the country will meet in Boston later this month to share their findings and to encourage others to join the fight against tuberous sclerosis. That symposium is being underwritten by the National Institute of Neurological and Communicative Disorders of the National Institutes of Health.

By designating the week of May 6 as "National Tuberous Sclerosis Week," we are helping to draw the attention of the public and the medical community to this crippling and often misdiagnosed disease.

I would like to thank the many Members of this House who have supported this symbolic but important legislation.

Fifteen years ago, Raymond and Linda Connors of Rockland, Mass., knew they were not alone as parents of a victim of tuberous sclerosis. Their efforts led to the formation of the Tuberous Sclerosis Association of America.

Since then, they and their organization have been the source of help and support for other families in their position. They have also been instrumental in spreading awareness of this disease to physicians and researchers in this country and around the world.

I applaud their efforts to bring hope of a cure to thousands of families and thank the chairwoman, Mrs. HALL for her expeditious handling of this resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL MENTAL HEALTH COUNSELORS WEEK

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 203) designating the week beginning April 8, 1984, as "National Mental Health Counselors Week," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would just like to indicate that I am very supportive of this resolution. It is a worthwhile resolution and I urge my colleagues to support it.

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that for the second year in a row Congress will send to the President a resolution, for his signature, recognizing the contribution of mental health counselors to the health of the Nation. I urge the House to support Senate Joint Resolution 203, the companion to my bill, House Joint Resolution 415, making the week of April 8 National Mental Health Counselors Week.

Mental health counselors provide 50 percent of all mental health services in this country. They help people daily with personal and adjustment problems as part of a clinical team. They work in a variety of settings—hospitals, community health centers, clinics, and in private practices. They frequently work in areas traditionally underserved by health professionals.

This may be a small effort on the part of Congress, but it is a big step toward bringing public attention and support to the need to provide adequate mental health care to all people in all parts of the country.

I wish to thank Congresswoman HALL for her help in bringing this bill to the House and the 230 Members of the House who cosponsored the bill. Since the Senate has passed companion legislation, I look forward to the President promptly signing it into law so that we can recognize these important professionals and their contributions next week.●

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 203

Whereas mental health counselors work in a specialized field of counseling which emphasizes the developmental and adjustive nature of mental health services;

Whereas mental health counselors utilize individual and group conseling techniques oriented toward assisting individuals with methods of problem solving, personal and social development decisionmaking, and the complex process of developing self-understanding and making life decisions;

Whereas mental health counselors work in conjunction with other helping professionals, such as psychiatrists, psychologists, and social workers to determine the most appropriate counseling for each client;

Whereas mental health counselors work in psychiatric hospitals, community mental health agencies, private clinics, college campuses, rehabilitation centers, and private practice providing almost 50 per centum of direct delivery of mental health services;

Whereas mental health counselors are individuals upon whom, by virtue of their education and extensive training, have been conferred masters or doctors of philosophy degrees in mental health counseling or community mental health counseling, or similar degree titles having a focus on mental health; and

Whereas mental health counselors, after having earned such degrees, have performed at least two years of supervised clinical counseling, and are licensed or certified as such in the State of their residence, or are certified by the National Academy of Certified Clinical Mental Health Counselors: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning April 8, 1984, is designated "National Mental Health Counselors Week." The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all Government agencies and the people of the United States to observe that week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL P.O.W./M.I.A. RECOGNITION DAY

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 171) to provide for the designation of July 20, 1984, as "National P.O.W./M.I.A. Recognition Day," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is an extremely urgent and important resolution to bring attention to the MIA's and POW's.

I rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 171 designating July 20, 1984, as "National POW/MIA Recognition Day."

POW's and MIA's are perhaps the most deserving heroes America has today and I would like to take the opportunity to commend my colleagues who have supported the legislation. It shows a deep concern and a concerted effort to honor our former prisoners of war and those missing in action. By establishing July 20, 1984, as a day of recognition for these brave servicemen, we proclaim our deep gratitude for their sacrifices and our profound sorrow for their fate.

The men who served their country in the frontlines of battle or in dangerous enemy territory were the first to be killed or taken captive. Our Nation owes these men and their families the profoundest statement of recognition for the losses they experienced at the hands of their captors. The ordeals of the POW's and MIA's certainly did not end with the wars in which they fought. The after effects of starvation, torture, and disease linger today in their bodies and minds.

Therefore, I feel it is imperative that this body act favorably in proclaiming July 20, 1984, a day of recognition for the men who gave so much for the sake of their Nation. Let us honor these men and assure that their sacrifices for the American people has not been forgotten.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this resolution.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. Under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from New York, who is the cosponsor of the resolution.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 171, which was introduced in the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS). This resolution establishes July 20, 1984, as "National POW/MIA Recognition Day." I was pleased to introduce a substantively similar bill in the House, House Joint Resolution 344. National POW/MIA Recognition Day is a fine and worthy way to commemorate the sacrifices which have been made, and may be still being made, by our Americans who are prisoners of war and missing in action.

Over the past few years, the Congress has approved this day to be set aside in respect and appreciation for the many Americans who have defended our Nation, and in so doing, have been taken prisoner of war, or remain missing in action. While the July 20 day is of significance to all POW's and MIA's, the day is especially significant when we remember the POW's and MIA's from the Vietnam war. There are 2,500 Americans still unaccounted for, and the families of our missing Americans, and the dedicated men and women in our Armed Forces continue to remember their special sacrifice. As the chairman of the House Task Force on American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia, I am especially mindful of the torturous struggle that has accompanied our efforts to account for our Vietnam-era missing. Refugee reports still indicate the possibility that Americans may be alive in Southeast Asia. Our Government has diligently pursued these reports over the years. We know that many Americans were taken as prisoners of war, and we also know that many did not return in Operation Homecoming in 1973. National POW/MIA Recognition Day enables us to focus our prayers, our hopes, and our commitment on the accounting and return of our Americans to their Nation and their families.

As part of the National POW/MIA Recognition Day ceremonies, States and communities have kept the vigil alive. Veterans' posts across our Nation have taken an active role in the commemoration of the ongoing contributions of our POW's and MIA's, and we expect that during the ceremonies this year, we will again witness their dedicated concern.

With the increasing national and international awareness of the prisoner of war and missing in action issue, POW/MIA Day has become a landmark day bringing Government officials, family members, service men and women together to commemorate the unique struggle of our prisoners of war and our missing in action.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to join in supporting this important resolution and to encourage appropriate ceremonies on July 20.

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his statement. It was a very eloquent statement on behalf of a very worthwhile movement in this country.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. Under my reservation, I yield to one of the great American patriots in Congress, my good friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLOMON).

□ 1500

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 344—the resolution introduced by my colleague from New York (Mr. GILMAN) to designate a National POW/MIA Recognition Day.

As a member of the Congressional Task Force on POW's and MIA's, I have had the privilege of working closely with Mr. GILMAN to focus more attention on this grave issue of continuing importance. The whereabouts of many brave Americans who served their country during the Vietnam conflict have still not been accounted for satisfactorily. Our task force has frequently met with the family members of those whose whereabouts have still not been explained.

In addition, I am proud to report that the Reagan administration has also been very instrumental in placing this issue at the forefront of our diplomatic communications with many Southeast Asian nations. The administration has made it clear to these countries that any warming of diplomatic relations is contingent upon their full cooperation in this regard.

The administration's efforts, coupled with the work of our task force, are succeeding in moving toward satisfactory resolution of this problem. Today, the Congress is also joining these efforts, by proclaiming a national day of recognition for our POW's and MIA's. I fully suport these efforts, and I strongly urge the adoption of the resolution.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COURTER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution.

I also commend the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN) on his work in this area. Both of us have worked a number of years on the MIA (missing in action) in Southeast Asia. I still feel that no Americans are being held in captivity against their will in Southeast Asia. I have been to Vietnam 12 times working on MIA issues. I was on the Woodcock Commission which investigated whether any Americans were still held prisoners in that part of the world. I had the privilege of also heading the Select Committee on Missing Persons in Southeast Asia for the House of Representatives.

I wish I were wrong. But in all the information, leads, and talking to neutral groups in that part of the world we could find no evidence that Americans are still alive. It is a sad report, but I do not want to mislead any of my colleagues of my position.

Having said that, I think we should continue with this task force, we should continue to gather information and follow up on the leads that come out of Vietnam. But I think it is rather sad to the families, if you give them hopes that their loved ones are still alive in that part of the world.

And I wish I were wrong, but I can find no hard, good, concrete evidence that any Americans are still alive. I do support the resolution.

Mr. COURTER. I appreciate the gentleman making that statement and clarifying the situation. The resolution is not obviously designed to be misleading. I do not think it is.

The statement of the gentleman from Mississippi certainly adds to the clarity of it.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my support to Senate Joint Resolution 171, designating July 20, 1984, as "National POW/MIA Recognition Day."

It is particularly important to designate a day to commemorate the nearly 2,500 American servicemen still missing from the conflict in Indochina. We have been waiting a long time since the end of the Vietnam war to determine the fate of our MIA's and POW's. National POW/MIA Recognition Day is one indication that we have not lost patience or diminished in the slightest way our commitment to these brave servicemen, their families, and everyone working to resolve this issue.

The final chapter of our involvement in the Vietnam war cannot be written while the POW/MIA issue remains unresolved. The House Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs, which I chair, has primary oversight jurisdiction on POW/MIA matters. Together with the Task Force on American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia, ably chaired by Congressman GILMAN, has pressed for a full accounting of the status of these American servicemen—and we will continue to do so.

The POW/MIA issue is a humanitarian question of fundamental importance. It transcends partisan political boundaries within the Congress and within our country and calls forth from each of us a firm and lasting commitment to keep faith with our servicemen who are missing in action from the Vietnam war.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution as follows:

S.J. RES. 171

Whereas the United States has fought in many wars;

Whereas thousands of Americans who served in such wars were captured by the enemy or are missing in action;

Whereas many American prisoners of war were subjected to brutal and inhuman treatment by their enemy captors in violation of international codes and customs for the treatment of prisoners of war and many such prisoners of war died from such treatment;

Whereas many Americans missing in action remain unaccounted for and the uncertainty surrounding their fate has caused their families to suffer acute hardship; and

Whereas the sacrifices of American prisoners of war and Americans missing in action and their families are deserving of national recognition: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the twentieth day of July 1984 shall be designated as "National P.O.W./M.I.A. Recognition Day" and the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to commemorate such day with appropriate activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL HEARING IMPAIRED AWARENESS WEEK

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 407) designating the week beginning April 8, 1984, as "National Hearing Impaired Awareness Week," and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

Mr. COURTER. Reserving the right to object, and I will not object, Mr. Speaker, I rise just to indicate that this is the fifth of five worthwhile resolutions. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from indiana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 407

Whereas more than fifteen million Americans of all ages experience some form of hearing impairment;

Whereas the deaf and hard of hearing have made significant contributions to society in virtually every occupational category and profession; and

Whereas the remaining impediments and obstacles encountered by those with hearing disorders must be recognized and eliminated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning April 8, 1984, is designated "National Hearing Impaired Awareness Week". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mrs. HALL of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolutions just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

PRESIDENT REAGAN DECLARES END TO U.S. ROLE IN LEBANON FORCE

(Mr. VENTO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased this weekend to notice that President Reagan has finally declared an end to the U.S. role in Lebanon and moved our Armed Forces out of that region.

Frankly, our policy in the Middle East has been an utter failure. In spite of the fact of the Reagan administration winning the day on the floor of this House and in the Senate with regard to the Lebanon policy and the declaration to keep troops there, it is clear that the Reagan house of cards with regard to foreign policy in the Middle East came tumbling down.

It was apparent to us many months ago. We regret the cost in American lives. We regret the cost in terms of the plight that has been visited upon the Lebanese people and upon all the Middle East.

The United States, who I think before this Reagan policy was executed, could have played a very positive role in the peace process, not by having ground troops in Lebanon, but by contributing to the negotiation process and supporting the Government, rather the Reagan policy is in utter disrepute and failure; so that the U.S. position is a much weakened position in this region of the world because of events that have occurred.

It is unfortunate that events and circumstances result in not a neutral situation where we could be in the same positive posture, but rather today we find continuing turmoil and a situation which is intolerable, but the United States is in a much weaker position to deal with it because of the Reagan policy path that was followed.

Hopefully, this will bring some light and insight to the Members of this body and the administration so that we can pursue more positive policies in other areas of the world which are troubled, such as Central America.

Mr. Speaker, I include the article from the Washington Post of March 31 which documents the sad reality of a foreign policy debacle.

REAGAN DECLARES END TO U.S. ROLE IN LEBANON FORCE

(By John M. Goshko)

President Reagan yesterday formally ended U.S. participation in the multinational force that failed to bring peace to Beirut, and U.S. officials said the American warships and Marines now off the coast of Lebanon gradually will return to cruising duties elsewhere in the Mediterranean Sea.

In a letter to Congress, Reagan announced termination of the U.S. role in the peacekeeping effort that began with the dispatch of more than 2,000 Marines to Beirut in September, 1982, following the massacre there of Palestinians, and ended in February when Reagan transferred the Marines to ships offshore.

"The United States has not abandoned Lebanon," the president said in his letter. But he added: "The continuation of our participation in the MNF is no longer a necessary or appropriate means of achieving [our] goals."

His letter, which was sent under the provisions of the congressional resolution authorizing the Marines to be in Beirut, did not say where and how the ships and Marines would be redeployed.

Pentagon and White House officials said privately that the warships, most of which are part of the U.S. Sixth Fleet, will return in gradual stages to routine patrol duties and other exercises in the Mediterranean.

These officials noted that a Marine amphibious force of roughly 2,000 men normally is kept with the fleet in the region, and they said it would be available for any "short-notice contingencies" that might require a return to Lebanon.

However, Reagan's action seemed to mark abandonment of the administration's contention that the February withdrawal to ships was merely a reshuffling of the American military force to make it more effective rather than a pullout from Lebanon.

"The Marines are being redeployed 2½ to 3 miles to the west," Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger said in testimony to Congress on Feb. 9.

Secretary of State George P. Shultz, who also appeared before the committee that day, insisted that putting the Marines on ships was "a rearranging of our military assets" and not an abandonment of the U.S. military commitment to Lebanon.

It since has become clear that the Marines were playing no effective role, as the fighting between feuding Lebanese factions has continued and as Lebanese President Amin Gemayel has moved away from U.S. support to reliance on Syria and Saudi Arabia to save his embattled government.

As Reagan noted in his letter, the other countries in the multinational force also "have made similar decisions" to end their participation. Italy and Britain have withdrawn their troops from Beirut, and France is in the process of evacuating the last of its forces from the city.

Reagan said a detachment of about 100 Marines will remain in Beirut to protect the U.S. Embassy, and "a limited number of U.S. military personnel equipped with personal weapons for self-defense will remain to provide military training" for the Lebanese army. But, he added, "these personnel will not be part of any multinational force."

The president's letter also gave an accounting of "the heavy burdens and grievous losses for our country" resulting from participation in the peace-keeping effort. It noted that 264 American military personnel were killed, primarily in the terrorist bombing of the Marine encampment at the Beirut airport last October.

It added that the the estimated costs of U.S. participation during the 1984 fiscal year totaled $14.6 million for the Marines, $44.9 million for the offshore naval support and $243,000 for U.S. Army support.

REAGAN ADMINISTRATION GIVING BUSINESS A BAD NAME

(Mr. SEIBERLING asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, yesterday's Washington Post business section contains an article by Jerry Knight, financial editor of the Washington Post, which points out that if the Reagan White House was a public company its ethical record over the past 3 years would make it one of the most disreputable firms in the country. The article states that none of the Fortune 500 companies have had as many ethical embarrassments as the White House in the last 3 years.

The article goes on to say that the White House has been involved in more dubious ethical situations than all the top 100 Washington companies combined. It not only cites a number of these instances but quotes from the conflict of interest codes of several Washington corporations and notes that, if these codes applied to the Reagan administration, many of the Presidential appointees, whose actions have been defended and their jobs protected by the administration, would have been summarily dismissed.

The article concludes by noting that Mr. Meese's undisclosed interest-free loans from people whom he helped to get Federal jobs would have disqualified him from continuing to serve as an executive of many of the Nation's major corporations.

Mr. Speaker, the full text of the Knight article follows these remarks.

REAGAN WHITE HOUSE GIVING BUSINESS A BAD NAME

(By Jerry Knight)

Business is getting a bad name from the business practices of Reagan administration officials.

Political debate will ultimately determine whether the two dozen embarrassing business deals involving appointed officials are regarded by voters as business as usual in Washington.

But the kind of transactions that have gotten White House appointees in trouble certainly are not business as usual in business.

If the Reagan White House were a public company its record over the past three years would make it one of the most disreputable of U.S. firms. No member of the Fortune 500 has had as many ethical embarrassments as the White House in the last three years.

From National Security Adviser Richard Allen's $1,000 gift from Japanese journalists and Ed Meese's $400 Korean cuff links, through the insider trading charges against deputy defense secretary W. Paul Thayer and White House aide Thomas C. Reed, to Meese's practice of taking loans from friends and then helping them get jobs, the White House has been involved in more questionable situations than all the Top 100 Washington businesses combined.

Add to that list Guy W. Fiske of the Commerce Department, who sought a new job with Comsat Corp. while negotiating a government contract with Comsat. Richard N. Perle, who as assistant secretary of Defense recommended a government contract for a firm that had paid him a $50,000 consulting fee. James Watt, whose terminal transgressions as Interior secretary included using government funds for private parties. Arthur Hull Hayes Jr., commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, who billed both the government and private firms for the same expenses. And James Sanderson, who was simultaneously consulting for the Environmental Protection Agency and representing EPA opponents.

Compare the actions of these Reagan appointees with the standards set in the conflict-of-interest code of one of Washington's biggest and best known public corporations.

"It has been and continues to be the company's established policy that all officers and employes of the company and its subsidiaries must avoid any situation which involves a possible conflict between their personal interest and the interests of the company. Only by adhering to this policy can the integrity of the company's business relationships be preserved and the financial and other interests of the company and its shareholders protected. Companies that have failed to enforce such a policy have experienced monetary losses, disruptive litigation and, most important, irreparable damage to their standing in the community."

If this company's code applied to the Reagan White House, many of the presidential appointees whose actions have been defended and their jobs protected for as long as politically possible would have been dismissed without debate.

Take Meese's cuff links and Dick Allen's pocket money. Take them and you'd get fired from a lot of companies. Take them from a supplier and you could be indicted for commercial bribery.

The code of the Washington firm prohibits "acceptance by a person subject to this policy, or any member of that person's immediate family * * * of gifts of merchandise of more than token value (retail value of over $50), cash or gift certificates in any amount whatever, loans (except from established banking or financial institutions), excessive entertainment or other substantial favors."

In addition to the ban on loans, the Washington firm prohibits employes from having "a substantial financial interest in any outside concern if such person has authority to make any decisions or recommendations or could have any influence regarding transactions between such concern and the company." By that standard as well, Meese-style loans would be off limits, and Fiske, Perle and Sanderson would be way off base.

The impression that Meese's gold and jade cuff links and his loan from a person who subsequently got a job in the administration amount to acceptable business practice has been fostered by editorials in The Wall Street Journal defending Meese. But such loans appear to violate the conflicts of interest policy of Dow Jones & Co., publishers of The Journal.

Dow Jones "employes should not accept, directly or indirectly, any gift, entertainment or reimbursement of expenses of more than normal value," the policy states. "Nor should they accept payment, loans, services, employment or any other benefit from any company or individual" doing business with Dow Jones.

Other charges against White House appointees go beyond conflict of interest into outright improprieties.

Is using a company car for personal business without permission any different from padding your expense account? Among the Reaganauts who have admitted to that and paid back the cost are former Veterans' Administration chief Robert Nimmo, Attorney General William French Smith, Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, Housing and Urban Development official Donald I. Hovde, and Consumer Product Safety Commission chief Nancy Harvey Steorts. Treasury Secretary Donald T. Regan has said he sees no need to repay the government for his wife's use of an official car and driver. Failure to report such benefits as income could get an individual in trouble with the Internal Revenue Service. Failure to disclose such perquisites to stockholders could get a public company in trouble with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The insider trading cases brought by the SEC against Thayer and Reed are further evidence of how out of step the Reagan White House is with the ethical standards of American business. No private business has had two of its executives accused of unrelated insider trading violations in two years.

Reed resigned and has agreed to pay back the $427,000 in profits he made on a $3,125 investment based on inside information. Thayer, too, has been forced out of office but says he will fight the charges. Whether Thayer will continue to resist and risk further publicity in the midst of the presidential campaign remains to be seen.

The same confrontation with public scrutiny and political reality faces Ed Meese. Maybe he can tough it out. Maybe a special prosecutor will give him a clean bill of health. Maybe the Senate will decide he is qualified to be the nation's highest law enforcement officer. Maybe he is. But there is little doubt that Meese's undisclosed interest-free loans from someone he helped get a job would disqualify him from serving as an executive of many of the nation's major corporations.

REPORT ON U.S. POLICY ON ASAT ARMS CONTROL

(Mr. BROWN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, the administration demonstrated its intention to march inevitably toward an arms race in space yesterday in a report submitted to the Congress entitled "U.S. Policy on ASAT Arms Control." Mr. Speaker, unfortunately this report makes abundantly clear that the President has no interest in arms control in space.

The report, which I refer to my colleagues for further detail, claims that an ASAT Treaty would be unverifiable. However, the report also indicates the administration's potential interest in a high-altitude ASAT Treaty. This approach is a smokescreen to gain step-by-step acceptance by the Congress of the full ASAT weapons system. Having gained approval of a low-altitude ASAT, the administration will predictably argue that we won't be able to verify a high-altitude system ban, and therefore should go ahead and deploy one. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we will tolerate this blatant attempt to hoodwink the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I and many of my colleagues have been urging this administration over the last year to seek negotiations with the Soviet Union to ban antisatellite weapons, and have been seeking an immediate and mutual test moratorium on ASAT's to avoid the verification problem the administration has referred to. The Soviet Union recently submitted a draft ASAT Treaty to the United Nations—it is a mystery to me why we stubbornly refuse to resume the negotiations we suspended in 1979 following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. If the President is truly interested in arms control, this is the perfect time to demonstrate it.

Mr. Speaker, last week I announced the formation of the Coalition for the Peaceful Uses of Space comprised of 20 of our colleagues who have joined forces with arms-control experts and public-interest groups, including the League of Women Voters, and Ambassador Gerard Smith, the negotiator of the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, to oppose the arms race in space. I invite my colleagues to join me in this important effort. The ASAT report is only the latest example of the alarming trend toward an arms race in space that must be stopped.

I include some relevant newspaper articles for the RECORD below.

U.S. To PUSH ANTISATELLITE WEAPONS TEST

(By Walter Pincus)

The Reagan administration plans to push ahead with development and testing of an antisatellite weapon and does not plan to seek a comprehensive ban on such weapons with the Soviet Union, according to informed administration sources.

Those views were contained in a report to Congress on antisatellite weapons that President Reagan signed yesterday, the sources said. The roughly 20-page unclassified document, with a much larger appendix of secret material, is scheduled to be delivered to Capitol Hill Monday in response to an amendment on last year's defense appropriation bill.

The administration is still looking at the possibility of negotiating a restrictive ban on some forms of antisatellite weapons, the sources said. "But so far no one has been able to figure one out that would be verifiable and in the national interest," one official said last week.

Led by legislators who wanted to head off what they described as a costly militarization of space, Congress last year overwhelmingly approved two amendments that limited the antisatellite program.

The first required a report on the president's arms control policy for such weapons by March 31, before the Pentagon could spend funds for items with long lead times that would be necessary to begin production of antisatellite weapons.

The second, sponsored by Sen. Paul E. Tsongas (D. Mass.), required the president to certify that the weapons were necessary for national security and that the United States was endeavoring "in good faith to negotiate a mutual and verifiable ban" on all such weapons before the U.S. weapon could be tested against a target in space.

The report signed by the president yesterday fulfills the first requirement but not the second. Sources said that since the test against a target is not scheduled to take place before this fall, the Tsongas restriction may be overtaken by other Senate action.

Sen. Larry Pressler (R-S.D.) announced Friday that he hoped to have a debate on antisatellite weapons in April when the Senate takes up a joint resolution that calls for the president to negotiate a treaty with the Soviet Union banning space weapons. The measure unanimously passed the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last November.

One official involved in the presidential report said yesterday that "it will be clear to readers of the report why we are not going to approach the Soviets on a comprehensive ban."

The report, he said, describes in detail not only how space is already filled with military satellites, but also how even the most rudimentary space vehicles and tests can be used for antisatellite weapons.

By pursuing antisatellite weapons, the administration also leaves open its options for developing a space-based, anti-ballistic missile system that would have been prohibited by a ban on antisatellite weapons.

The Soviet Union has had an antisatellite weapon since the late 1960s. Launched into an orbit similar to its target's, it reaches a point close to its target after two or three revolutions around the earth, then explodes.

Although some scientists have termed the Soviet system simplistic and easy to counter, Pentagon officials have argued that it is more sophisticated and can easily be upgraded without further testing.

The report, sources said, also will make clear that other techniques the Soviets have practiced, such as docking of vehicles in space, could be easily transferred to antisatellite weapons.

The U.S. system is launched by a rocket that is initially carried to a high altitude by an F15 fighter. The rocket fires a miniature homing vehicle carrying infrared sensors that guide it directly into the target satellite.

Under current plans, the Air Force will hold its first development test against a target balloon in space this fall. It tried out the rocket system Jan. 21, and another similar test is expected shortly.

A panel of the Union of Concerned Scientists, an organization of distinguished professionals who support arms control measures, came up with many of the same findings as the administration group after studying the issue.

One of the panel's conclusions was that a ban on possession of antisatellite weapons "would be hard to verify."

Despite its agreements with the administration on the inability to ban possession of antisatellite weapons, the scientists' panel proposed a treaty that would ban "all tests of a weapon against any object in space, no matter what the weapon's basing mode may be."

Such an agreement, the panel says in an article to be published in June in Scientific American, could not "be verified to perfection."

"What finally counts," the scientists concluded, "is whether the activities that could plausibly escape detection pose a graver risk" than the perils of not having a treaty.

A Pentagon official said yesterday that the administration cannot take such a risk.

On March 23, the Soviet delegate to the U.N. Committee on Disarmament meeting in Geneva introduced a draft treaty that would ban the testing and deployment of antisatellite weapons as part of a broader prohibition of arms in space.

Soviet leader Konstantin U. Chernenko has listed a ban on space weapons as one of several steps the United States could take to show it is sincere about making progress in arms control.

REAGAN REPORT PESSIMISTIC ON SATELLITE-KILLER PACT

(By Leslie H. Gelb)

WASHINGTON, March 30.—A Reagan Administration report to be given to Congress concludes that a ban on specific antisatellite weapons may be possible to verify but that Administration experts have yet to figure out how to do it and doubt that it can be done, officials said today.

The report, in response to a Congressional mandate to study the feasibility of antisatellite arms control, is to be presented Saturday. It has been several months in preparation, and the final draft was completed only Thursday after what officials described as bitter struggles. State Department officials said they wanted to show Congress that the Administration was trying to study seriously the feasibility of controlling antisatellite weapons, while Pentagon officials made it clear they wanted to close the door entirely on a treaty because of what they said were formidable problems in verifying such agreements.

The report is said to draw distinctions between kinetic energy weapons, which destroy satellites by impact, and others that involve more sophisticated technologies. Officials said the report casts particular doubt on whether it is possible to verify a ban on impact weapons and stresses the need to continue development of an American impact weapon for destroying Soviet surveillance satellites.

Under the 1984 Defense Department Appropriations Act, Congress required the Administration to submit the report by March 31. Otherwise, the Pentagon would be prohibited from spending any of $19.4 million appropriated for obtaining long-lead-time items for an American antisatellite weapon. The Administration is seeking $143 million more in this year's budget.

TOTAL BAN IS RULED OUT

The language of the act also requires the Administration "to endeavor in good faith to negotiate a mutual and verifiable ban on antisatellite weapons" before proceeding with the testing of a weapon against a target in space.

Officials said the report rules out any hope of a comprehensive ban on antisatellite weapons and goes into considerable detail on the problems of verifying compliance with a ban. Officials said there was little or no disagreement among the Administration experts studying the issue that a ban on all or even on most antisatellite weapons would be unverifiable. The main problem, in the view of many Administration experts, is that anything that can put a satellite into orbit can potentially be used to destroy a satellite.

The Union of Concerned Scientists, with its own roster of eminent scientists and technicians, issued a report last week saying adequate verification of a treaty banning such weapons was possible. This view is based essentially on the judgment that neither side has done enough testing of any system to be sure it would work and that testing a system would be detectable.

WHAT THE TWO SIDES HAVE

The Soviet Union has an antisatellite weapon that many experts say is not very reliable. It weighs several thousand pounds, is carried aloft by older Soviet rockets and can reach only low-flying American satellites. Most American satellites are above its range.

A more sophisticated American weapon, which is to be tested this fall, is a small, two-stage rocket booster with a small homing vehicle and is launched from an F-15 fighter plane. Unlike its Soviet counterpart, which coasts unpowered at orbital altitude for at least part of its flight, the homing device streaks directly toward its target at high speed.

The private experts of the Union of Concerned Scientists include Noel Gayler, a retired admiral and former director of the National Security Agency, and Richard L. Garwin, a former member of high-level military and scientific Presidential commissions. Both had access to the same secret information available to current Administration experts.

The Union of Concerned Scientists report maintains that Administration studies are pessimistic about verification of treaties against antisatellite weapons because they "tend to match only current monitoring capacities against future conceivable but nonexistent ASAT weapons."

THE NEED FOR TESTS

The private report says that covert Soviet efforts to upgrade its present antisatellite system would be risky and that launch preparations for new systems would be unmistakable. According to the report, covert development of exotic space-based lasers would be a formidable task, "even if unrestricted testing in space were permitted."

As for ground- or air-based lasers, the report states that these would require high accuracy, which would be difficult to confirm without tests against space targets, which would leave "a host of tell-tale signs." As for using space mines or current intercontinental-range missiles or antiballistic missiles against space targets, the report contends that their tracks and maneuvering would also be detectable. The report also dismisses the possibility of what is called breakout—Moscow's quickly assembling a usable antisatellite system after abrogating a treaty, saying it would be much harder than Administration experts allow.

MERGER-MANIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BIAGGI). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. LUNDINE) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, following in the footsteps of the very successful creators of the board games "Monopoly" and "Trivial Pursuit," I am thinking about devising a new board game which I would call Merger-Mania. This game would involve several players in roles as the management and stockholders of major corporations. Each corporation would be pitted against the others at the outset with the sole objective of amassing more wealth than one's opponent. The true "masters of the game" would probably end up being those who best learned how to prosper from the use of such devices at their disposal such as "leveraged buyout," "poison pill," "staggered board terms," "fair price," "blank check preferred," "supermajority," "pac-man," "white knight," "antitrust," "regulated buy," "self-tender," "hostile takeover," and "scorched earth."

Unfortunately, I cannot claim credit for invention of the idea for my new game or the clever devices the players would have to master in order to win the game. Rather, the concept on which "Merger-Mania" would be based is grounded in real life circumstances and the devices were invented by many of our most clever corporate managers and investment bankers. They reflect the reality of today's corporate world.

The obvious difference between my board game and what is occurring throughout many corporate boardrooms across the United States today is that the stakes involved in the latter are magnitudes higher than with the former. There is almost no newspaper, magazine, or newscast that you can read or listen to today without hearing reference to corporate merger activity. The very structure and nature of economic activity in the United States is being reorganized before our very eyes.

About a year ago I attended a conference with chief executive officers from many of our Nation's Fortune 500 companies. While I was visiting with them during the dinner hour, one asked me what I thought their biggest professional fear was. While I could identify a Congressman's biggest fear as losing the next election, I could not imagine what it might be for a CEO of a major corporation. I said I had no idea. They responded that their biggest fear was corporate takeover. They had found that the more successful they were, the bigger the risk someone would make a bid to takeover their firm.

The total amount of merger activity in our economy has increased dramatically since 1975. In 1975, $11.8 billion of credit went to finance mergers in the United States—in 1981, $82.6 billion—in 1982, $53.8 billion—and in 1983, $73.5 billion. This year, we have already seen merger activity or proposals approaching $40 billion. Moreover, mergers are increasing in size. More and more involve acquisition costs higher than $1 billion.

We are seeing merger activity of many types. We are seeing horizontal and vertical mergers within industries such as oil and steel. We are seeing conglomerate mergers between industries. We are witnessing international joint ventures within industries. We are seeing firms divest some of their operations as part of a merger strategy.

Why is all this merger activity taking place? What does it mean for future eocnomic growth? What is an appropriate response by the Federal Government to this new merger wave?

These are critical questions. From the time of passage of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act in 1890, economists have acknowledged the critical importance of corporate structure to the preservation of competition, stable prices, and economic growth. The pivotal nature of this issue is not less important today. Our problem is that today we are trying to cope with 1980's antitrust problems on theoretical rather that economic grounds. We must put antitrust policy on a course which can contribute to future productivity improvement, competitiveness of U.S. industries, and economic growth.

The effect of merger activity on our economy is not well understood. When this issue has been raised in the past, with good reason, Congress has been reluctant to place inflexible, stringent bans on merger activity because they realized that the context in which that merger activity takes place is critically important to its desirability. In fact, some merger activity is generally considered to be expected, particularly during economic recessions, periods of high interest rates, and in instances where stocks are undervalued. In addition, it has been generally recognized that in many instances mergers can contribute to greater economies of scale and thereby increase the competitiveness of given industries.

But, there are many disturbing differences in the trend in merger activity we are witnessing today. First, it is much larger in dollar scope than any we have witnessed in the past. This raises a legitimate question regarding the effect this activity is having on the availability of credit for more productive, long term investments. Almost every expert admits there is at least a short term drag on credit availability due to substantial merger activity.

Second, in addition to the impact on credit availability, to our economic detriment, it is becoming increasingly attractive to invest in mergers and short term ventures instead of productivity new capacity. Our corporate managers are fixated with what is at the bottom of the next quarter's balance sheet. No matter how conscientious a manager these days, the scorecard of a good manager is short term profits.

Reward in corporate America is no longer based on productivity improvement, but rather on who is most cleaver at manipulating the system. This new generation of "paper entrepreneurialists," as named by Robert Reich, is a major factor in the erosion of U.S. competitiveness in many key sectors of our economy. "Professional managers at the top of American firms have come to preside over a symbolic economy," writes Reich.

Third, this latest merger wave comes on the heels of over a decade of declining productivity growth in the United States. In the late sixties productivity growth began to slow until it actually began to decline in 1979.

Since productivity growth is the essential component to an improved standard of living, this latest merger wave must be evaluated in terms of its potential contribution to reversing the decline in productivity performance. While it can be argued that mergers can enhance productivity through greater efficiencies, there are some disturbing aspects to this latest merger trend which have not been present in the past.

For the first time corporations are increasingly acquiring other firms through the use of hostile takeovers. These are acquisitions which take place when one firm goes over the objections of another firms management to appeal to the shareholders to acquire the firm. As recently as 1970, bankers generally refused to finance hostile takeover bids. In this latest merger wave, this no longer is the case. Banks are placing their bets on and financing corporate winners and losers in a string of large hostile takeover bids. Their rewards are lucrative. The investment bankers who financed the Gulf-Socal deal, the largest merger in our history, received $46.5 million and $16.5 million in fees for their efforts, respectively.

This latest merger wave might very well be nicknamed "Corporate Warfare" in response to the number of hostile takeovers. I think we must be concerned about the impact such hostile takeovers can have on the employees of a firm—on labor-management relations, on the quality of their working lives, and on their ability to innovate. The objective in a hostile takeover is to reward the shareholder. No attention is paid to the impact on the worker or the ramifications on productivity performance, international competitiveness, and community adjustment which might flow from an unwanted acquisition or divestiture.

Another disturbing characteristic of this latest merger trend is the increasing reliance on the leveraged buyout as an acquisition tool. Leveraged buyouts occur when one company acquires another with large amounts of borrowed money. This means that firms along with their acquisitions are stacking up larger and larger amounts of debt. Such debt financing has the potential of making many sectors of our economy, including banking, more susceptible to cyclical fluctuations in our economy and international competition.

Merger-mania is also a factor to be considered in our deficit-reduction efforts. We are facing $500 to $600 billion in Federal deficits over the next 3 years. As such, the structure of our Tax Code must come under increasing scrutiny and only the most defensible tax exclusions should be retained.

Currently, we provide encouragement to merger activities through many provisions of the Tax Code. For example, a corporation with a stock portfolio is now allowed to exclude from Federal income taxes 85 percent of the dividends it earns on another corporation's shares. It can also deduct the interest expense on money borrowed to finance takeovers. These types of pure financial incentives for merger activity are highly questionable and must be reviewed.

In short, I believe there are disturbing factors about the current merger trend which should cause us to pause and examine what this means for future economic growth and how we should respond to it. In addition, I believe that our current institutional framework for dealing with antitrust policy is inadequate as well as the substance of our antitrust laws and regulations.

Over the last decade, the nature of international competition has changed dramatically. Consider this. In 1970, OPEC had not even been formed yet. In 1970, the import share of developed countries in the domestic U.S. steel market was barely 5 percent. U.S. machine tool manufacturers dominated the U.S. market and had nearly a quarter of the world market. In 1965, the import share of the U.S. automobile market was only 6 percent. In 1970, semiconductors had not been invented yet.

Compare this to where we are today in each of these sectors of our economy. U.S. proven oil reserves are falling—we may very likely only have enough proven reserves to meet domestic oil needs for another decade at most. Import penetration in steel is approaching 20 percent. The Japanese are challenging and capturing many of the U.S. traditional markets for machine tools. Foreign automobile producers have captured as much as 27 percent of the domestic U.S. automobile market in recent years. Today, Japanese firms have captured 40 percent of the U.S. semiconductor market.

International competition is intense. Our antitrust policy is one tool we have in designing a response to that competition. To use this tool effectively we must address the more generic issues raised above regarding the groundrules which should surround takeover bids so that we do not damage productivity and so that we discourage paper entrepreneurialism. These groundrules must incorporate an element of fairness to employees who are affected by corporate takeov-

ers. In this context we must also eliminate tax and regulatory incentives counterproductive to the goal of improving the international competitiveness of U.S. industry.

We must begin to deal with antitrust questions on economic grounds. We must provide a mechanism for consideration of industry-by-industry needs in an increasingly competitive world economy. Instead of using mathematical formulas to determine whether or not a proposed merger meets an arbitrary test of competition, we have to take into account the individual needs of particular sectors of our economy and the factors that might impact their future on the international horizon. Percentage of U.S. market is no longer a relevant test—the market that counts today is the world market. Here U.S. producers face many different forms of competition where antitrust policy is only one competitive tool.

We need a mechanism to help review, in particular, proposed mergers of significant size in key industrial sectors of our economy on other than legalistic grounds. Often this will involve access to accurate data regarding the competitive position of foreign industries which is not now available anywhere in Government or the private sector. Once accurate data is available, many of the other factors which must be looked at in determining the merit of such proposed mergers are subjective in nature. Agreement on interpretations of available data and a consensus between Government, industry, labor, and the public interest on certain subjective factors in merger decisions is critically important.

Often mergers will involve tradeoffs between various stakeholders in a given proposal. For example, the recent steel merger between LTV and Republic Steel will result in some plant closings and dislocated workers. An agreement to allow this merger to go forward might also be an acceptable alternative to additional trade protection being sought by the industry.

Arriving at a consensus regarding what the facts are surrounding the competitive position of U.S. industry, how to deal with the economic dislocation caused by mergers, and the conditions under which such a merger should go forward are important to understand in today's intensely competitive world.

I have proposed legislation in Congress to create an Economic Cooperation Council to help develop an industrial strategy for the United States to improve the international competitiveness of key sectors of our industrial economy. This Council would be comprised of representatives of Government, business, labor, and the public interest. They would be an advisory body only to the administration and Congress. Their task would be to collect and analyze data on the status of internationally competitive industries and formulate a consensus on policy approaches to critical issues facing sectors of our economy.

They would be available to render advice on important antitrust questions and assist in determining how proposed merger activities affect long term competitiveness. They would help insure that both labor and industry are in accord on a proposed restructuring plan for an industry and that these plans are in the public interest before antitrust immunity is granted. Occasionally, conceivably, they would assist in extracting certain commitments in exchange for merger approval.

Let us examine some specific merger proposals to illustrate how important it is that we go beyond mathematical modeling to determine antitrust implications. One of the motivating factors which caused me to take out this special order was the conclusions I had reached about three recent antitrust issues—the General Motors-Toyota joint venture to assemble small cars in Fremont, Calif.—the string of multibillion dollar oil mergers taking place—and the steel merger between LTV and Republic Steel. In each of these cases, I perceived an over-reliance on mathematical formulas instead of economic commonsense.

The Federal Trade Commission has given its approval to a joint venture between General Motors and Toyota—the largest and third largest car manufacturers in the world—to assemble small cars in California. The decision to approve this venture is based on a narrow interpretation of antitrust law, with little consideration of a strategy to support prospects for retention of long term capacity to produce small cars in the United States.

In an effort to explain its decision to allow the joint venture to go forward, the Federal Trade Commission wrote:

> The Commission is concerned about cooperation between companies that are otherwise competitors. On the other hand, the Commission wants to encourage procompetitive arrangements through which companies can produce more efficiently and bring more and cheaper products to the consumer. Dangers of noncompetitive cooperation would increase if the venture expanded its production or if it lasted for a longer period. Also, competition could be harmed if GM and Toyota used the venture as one opportunity for coordination and communication about matters that are not really necessary to the venture's operation.

What the FTC fails to acknowledge is the impact this joint venture is likely to have on U.S. domestic competitors of General Motors—basically Chrysler and Ford in terms of future small car production. In a lawsuit challenging the FTC decision, Chrysler is alleging that General Motors and Toyota will minimize their competition against each other by exchanging design information and jointly planning product development, marketing, pricing, and advertising. As a result, General Motors and Toyota will be able to increase competition against other car makers like Chrysler.

More disturbing to be is the fact that this joint venture, combined with an effort by General Motors to import Japanese small cars for sale under their trademark will probably enable General Motors to undersell their domestic small car competitors. This Japan Strategy on the part of General Motors will force Chrysler and others to seek similar agreements with foreign producers to remain competitive. This will mean that a larger and larger portion of small car production will be produced abroad. Instead of concentrating on the development of the creation of competitive domestic U.S. capacity to produce a small car, our car manufacturers will be playing a game of who can put together the international conglomerate combination which will yield the cheapest small car. Under this scenario, U.S. jobs and productive capacity will suffer.

I would predict we are going to see more of these joint ventures proposed in the future. Boeing is already in discussion with the Japanese on a potential joint venture for production of aircraft. Under pressure from Aribus, which is subsidized by several European governments, Boeing is exploring this connection. Instead of focusing on what we can do to make U.S. aircraft production competitive over the long term, Boeing may eventually be forced to greater reliance on overseas parts and production.

A second instance of adverse economic impact due to outdated antitrust policy has to do with oil mergers. While according to the Reagan administration, these multibillion mergers are not anticompetitive under existing antitrust regulations, it seems to me we are failing to take into consideration their potential impact on domestic energy production and the broader implications which energy has for our economy.

Any attempt to talk about competition in the oil industry must acknowledge the fact that two-thirds of the world's proven oil reserves lie in the Middle East. Under these circumstances, effective competition is not possible. We also must be concerned about the fact that proven U.S. domestic oil reserves are falling. The only hope for improving this situation is to stimulate exploration in the United States, which is discouraged by the tendency to merge to acquire reserves instead of exploring to find them. It is no surprise that in recent years independent oil companies and smaller integrated oil firms have increased their proven reserves while the large major integrated oil producers have lost ground.

We must also be concerned about the impact these oil mergers are likely to have on the operation of refineries and gas stations as outlets for our oil products. As oil firms merge, they often divest themselves of refinery and retailing capacity. It is possible and may even be likely that these units would be purchased by Middle Eastern oil countries in an effort to secure outlets for their product. Such a move cannot be in the long term energy interest of the United States. Moreover, the effect these mergers have on independent refineries and gas station operators must be carefully considered.

A third example of the limitations of current antitrust regulations involves the steel merger between LTV and Republic Steel. After having first rejected this merger, the Justice Department has reluctantly agreed to allow it to go forward under a condition that LTV divest itself of two of its operating facilities. The initial rejection of this merger was an absolute outrage of legalistic thinking prevailing over economic reality.

This merger will permit these companies to combine the most competitive segments of their facilities so that they can produce a better product more efficiently and at cheaper cost. It is estimated that the merged combination of these firms will save up to $300 million per year. This could mean the difference in an increasingly competitive steel industry which will enable some plants to stay open that would otherwise close and some steel workers to keep their jobs.

The alternative to this kind of merger in the steel industry might very well be additional trade protection. Because steel is one of the basic building blocks of our industrial economy we simply cannot permit domestic production to wither away. While we must seek to encourage greater and greater production of specialized steel in the United States, at the same time we are going to need to perserve some capacity for producing integrated steel.

I am sure you are all aware of the legislation which is pending before us now seeking to establish a fixed 15 percent quota on steel imports. Given a positive rationalization program involving the LTV-Republic merger and other steps, we should be able to avoid this type of trade action. Had we been focusing on development of such an adjustment program for our steel industry, instead of the narrow mathematical criteria regarding market share set forth in our antitrust regulations, the LTV-Republic Steel merger would not have been rejected in the first place.

I believe the three specific cases I have referenced above demonstrate an antitrust policy out of touch with economic realities. The LTV-Republic Steel merger is only the first in a series of major mergers which must occur in many of our key industrial sectors if we are to remain internationally competitive. As these proposals become more common, we must have in place a workable mechanism to better understand how these decisions impact long-term industrial competitiveness. Just as there is potential to make major strides forward in industrial adjustment through mergers, there is at the same time potential for abuse.

I believe the development of a consensus-based industrial strategy through an Economic Cooperation Council can assist in making these cutting edge decisions. Next week, the full House Banking Committee will act on legislation to create a framework for a consensus-based industrial strategy. In the weeks ahead, as this legislation moves forward and onto the House floor, I hope you will recognize the very important link it has to the merger issue we are hearing so much about today and for which we have no immediate response.

I believe there is cause for distress over the current drift of merger activity in this country. The proposed joint venture between General Motors and Toyota, I am convinced, will end up costing Americans jobs. The latest of the oil mergers—Texaco's $10 billion purchase of Getty—Mobil's $5.7 billion purchase of Superior—and Socal's $13.2 billion purchase of Gulf—are disturbing, not only because of their dollar volume, but also because they will discourage domestic exploration and encourage foreign penetration of downstream marketing activities. Finally, the near rejection of the LTV-Republic merger demonstrates the disarray in current antitrust policy.

The laws and regulations governing mergers and acquisitions must be reformed to discourage paper entrepreneurialism and to encourage productivity growth and fairness to labor and management alike.

There are signs of congressional concern over these issues. But I believe we must become much more active in voicing our points of view. We can start, I believe, with some concerted action on the pending oil mergers. As you probably know, the Senate last week rejected an effort to place a moratorium on oil mergers while a special commission examined their ramifications in favor of a substitute amendment which provides for a study of merger impacts by July 1 by the Finance, Judiciary and Energy Committees of the Senate.

I believe that action offers us too little, too late. I hope the respective House committees with jurisdiction over this issue will move expeditiously forward to fashion a response to these critically important mergers which will permit us to examine them before they are cast in stone—and to act to protect our national energy interests. Whether we are dealing with oil mergers, steel mergers, or a proposal affecting some other industry, the guiding criteria must involve long term economic competitiveness and consensus-back strategies whenever possible and not mathematical formulas narrowly drawn.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE).

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, the "merger sweeptakes" in the oil industry continue, and the sales pitch is tried and tested—"Big is Beautiful." Well, I am not so sure. While bigger is not necessarily "badder," I believe the time has come for Congress to put the brakes on the onrushing tidal wave of big oil mergers. What is needed now is time—time to assess carefully and responsibly the impact of these huge, unanticipated consolidations on the economy and the national interest.

As many of my colleagues know, on March 19, I introduced H.R. 5175, which imposes a 9-month moratorium on mergers involving the 50 largest oil companies. During the past 2 weeks, I have been working to build a bipartisan consensus for this bill. I have spoken on this floor during that time about many of my concerns:

About how the oil barons are playing a real-life version of Parker Brothers' "Monopoly" game. Go around the board, gobble up as many big oil companies as you can, and then pass "Go" to collect billion dollar profits. If an uncompetitive, concentrated oil industry is to be the end result of the current "merger mania," you can bet the oil profiteers will not stop until they have the consumer "over a barrel" and on "bended knee."

About how the taxpayer is effectively subsidizing these consolidations through the 46-percent corporate tax rate. I have cited from the "Book of Internal Revenue"—"Thus sayeth the Code—Go forth ye large oil companies and merge, for the working people of thy country shall subsidize these takeovers and huge profits shall be yours!"

About how we need to put the bite on the big oil sharks before they put the bite on small business—and swallow it whole. My bill has been endorsed by several groups representing small business, each of which has indicated that small businesses will be devastated by this real-life sequel to the movie "Jaws."

About how we need to examine the impact that these mergers will have on exploration. Evidence suggests that exploration for new reserves will decline, and a stable domestic oil supply is vital to our economic health and defense preparedness. I have said before and will say again—I am increasingly concerned that when the merger crests, the only thing getting drilled will be the American people, and the only thing being pumped will be huge profits from the pockets of consumers.

And finally, about how recent actions in the other body watering down a moratorium bill reflect the same old story—special interests at work again. Oil and water do not mix, and I hope this body will not permit a moratorium bill to be devoured by the special-interest pac-men.

Mr. Speaker, the recent oil merger record speaks for itself—Shell-Belridge Oil at $3.6 billion—Occidental-Cities Services at $4 billion—Mobil-Superior at $5.7 billion—U.S. Steel-Marathon Oil at $6.5 billion—DuPont-Conoco at $7.4 billion—Texaco-Getty at $10.1 billion—Socal-Gulf at $13.4 billion. Onward and upward the merger spiral goes, and there is no indication that the madness will stop. Salomon Brothers of New York has identified nine oil companies that are likely targets of additional takeovers—including such well-established firms as Pennzoil and Phillips Petroleum.

Mr. Speaker, we must act now before it is too late to take effective and responsible action. The concerns I have raised in the last 2 weeks are just the start. Are our antitrust laws, as written, sufficient to evaluate these unparalleled consolidations? Are the antitrust laws being properly enforced by Justice and the FTC? Is investment capital being tied up by the huge credit lines required to finance these mergers? What will be the long-term impact on the consumer and employees of targeted companies? The "merger race" is in danger of overheating, and if we do not act soon to address these and other concerns, it will be the American people who get burned.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to close by citing a short piece of poetry:

Humpty Dumpty sat on the wall,
Humpty Dumpty had a great fall.
To monopolies trust busters put a sure end,
Why should we put Humpty together again?
For decades our anti-trust laws seemed sound,
But now billion dollar mergers abound.
Bigger and bigger the new oil trusts grow,
First Marathon, then Socal, and then Conoco.
The message is clear from this new merger trend,
Humpty Dumpty is being pieced together again.
So will Congress act to keep competition alive?
The answer my friend, is H.R. 5175!

□ 1520

Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ECKART).

Mr. ECKART. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it has always been a fundamental principle, I suppose, of our free enterprise system that Government should allow economic forces to play as freely as possible through a complex and diverse economy. It has also been fundamental to Government activities, when intervention is necessary, that that intervention be based principally on the theory of a free and open economic market. For instance, regulation deems to be a substitute for competition or a monopoly is awarded, such as in the areas of public utilities.

We have been called upon in the past often to intervene for purposes of remembering that our power to act is and really always must be closely linked to the responsibility of Government to act in the broader interests of the majority of our citizens.

Essentially, the Government should intervene in the affairs of private enterprise only in those very narrow instances when the larger population is adversely affected, when the national interests, particularly as it may relate to our Nation's defense, are hindered.

It may come as a shock to some, but I am not prepared in the course of this special order today to argue that big is necessarily bad.

I am concerned, however, about the recent trends toward the accumulation of wealth in corporate America. Just about 20 years ago, 400 of our Nation's largest corporations controlled two-thirds of the Nation's corporate wealth, and now, just two decades later, the centralization has resulted in just 200 corporations controlling almost 70 percent of this Nation's corporate economic wealth.

Now we are confronted with a new merger mania involving oil companies, which is a spinoff of what took place just 2½ years ago.

In February the FTC saw nothing wrong with Texaco's $10.0 billion acquisition of Getty Oil. Yet we can ask how many jobs were created, how many barrels of oil produced, how much economic activity stimulated with that acquisition.

The Reagan administration, from my perspective, has turned a blind eye toward this and in fact they encourage this form of corporate cannibalism without any regard to the efficiencies both of a management or capital nature that may result.

Our energy industry is critical to the economic revitalization of this Nation. We cannot stand idly by and allow it to go the path of other industries that find themselves in dire economic straits. However, if the consumers of our petrochemical products are to truly benefit, and we have to make sure that the economies are scaled to which mergers seem to promote, actually will give greater choice to us in years ahead.

We cannot witness oil companies taking money that they have garnered from the decontrol of oil passed by this House and accelerated by this administration, and instead of plowing those profits back into capitalization of other industries, spread it out into nonproductive uses and in effect denying opportunities to capitally deprived industries to grow.

These actions could ultimately prove to be detrimental to our economic growth. And the prospect of increasing concentration in an already dominant oil industry of a few megagiants may not be in the best interests of the public nor in the long-term economic interests of this nation.

We cannot allow this administration to continue to lead us down a yellow brick road of economic recovery where in every instance bigger is better. The result is less competition, more monopolies.

But in enforcing a meaningful antitrust policy, I think we have to look at what ought those standards to be. As my friend from New York said, original trust busting that went on in these Halls almost 90 years ago was directly and properly intended to diversify and to give greater responsibility to the public through the merger acquisition process. Those times have changed dramatically. I think we have to look at the whole merger acquisition question with three new central ideas:

First, in the merger that is contemplated, what new access to capital or cash flow will the merged companies now have? Second, what impact will it have not only on the domestic market here in the United States but the international market as well, because we are truly an international economy? And third, what new efficiencies to both management and operation may result that will enhance an economic entity's ability to be more productive?

I think that a reasonable argument can be made that the Justice Department and the FTC have focused too narrowly in recent decisions only on the impact of U.S. markets. They failed to take into account external considerations such as the changing and more competitive global economy and the unfair practices of foreign competitors.

As my friend from New York pointed out, you get the Justice Department and the FTC considering similar complaints from similar industries of unfair and illegal dumping practices, denying to them economic opportunities in the United States, and at the same time slamming the door on the way for them to get out of those difficult economic circumstances at the same time.

This merger that we had dealing particularly with Republic Steel and LTV should in fact, if tested against the three different principles of access to capital and cash flow, international competition and the consequences of actions by our trading allies, and the effectiveness, particularly as it relates to management and operation and age, would lead one to the conclusion that those mergers were in the best interests of the United States, the best interests of the international community as well.

In the steel industries, it is terribly difficult to have access to cash, to cash flow, when you are losing money. There are tremendous impacts of international competition through the countless lawsuits pending and actions before our Government dealing with international competition, and an old, inefficient industry.

In effect what I am saying, and what I hear my friend say, as well, is that mergers can be a more useful tool of the marketplace in helping settle problems than arbitrary actions such as quotas or limitations that they come here to us to talk about. In fact, some of my friends from both sides of the aisle say, "Let the marketplace be free, let it work." Well, with the standards that I suggest here, I think it would be in our Nation's interest.

Let us look at one other consequence of mergers and antitrust policy. We stand on this floor day after day doing things that affect people's lives in many ways, particularly in areas where we encourage people in environmental matters to do things that we think are in the public interest. However, we preclude industries in the United States, after we having made a public policy decision to do something good in the environmental area, from getting together to settle their questions in a joint manner.

Dealing with the antitrust laws and updating them, bringing them into the 20th century so they will be good into the 21st century in the areas of joint research and development, particularly as it relates to environmental matters, I think is in the national interest and I think in the corporate interest as well.

We can look at a bunch of examples. Japanese electronics firms are integrated vertically, blessed with Government assistance and advantages which, if they were located here in these United States, violate our existing laws.

I think we must update our antitrust policy selectively and carefully. We must consider a contemporary approach to antitrust.

We must, of course, act to protect the ultimate consumers; we must prevent price fixing and collusive anticompetitive practices here at home. I think it is becoming increasingly clear that trying to protect the marketplace of the 1890's from the realities of the 1980's further dooms this Nation to economic failure.

We have had many successful big mergers; look at the rail industry. Through the depths of the worst recession since the Great Depression, we have witnessed an amalgamation of the railroads that now have us with over half-a-dozen large railroads doing very, very well.

There have been any number of other successes where big has been better. I would point out to my colleagues that Phillip Morris bought Lite Beer. They are now the No. 2 contender in the United States today because they had greater access to capital, increased cash flow, and they updated an old plant and facility to become competitive in America.

R. J. Reynolds bought Hublein, Inc. Pan American took over National Airlines; the McDonnell Douglas merger; American Express and Shearson Loeb. All brought to it an ability to be competitive in the international marketplace, increased access to capital and greater efficiencies from better management.

That was the marketplace working, and not Congress legislating. We cannot allow some of our basic industries to go the way of the dinosaur. Some of the success stories I just referred to, I think, adequately should encourage us to do as my friend from New York suggested and that is to bring us home to economic antitrust research and development policies that make sense today and, oh, for my 4-year-old son who could not see over the top of this table.

The issues in this debate, as my friend knows from his extended experience, are not black and white nor very simple. But if we continue to focus on what is in the Nation's interest by testing what is against our national interests in a world economy we will better served.

I think that the free enterprise system which can allow economic policy to flow freely and fairly across all international economic boundaries is in our interests. I think it is in the interests of our mutual constituents. I would hope that in the course of the debate we would pay attention to the peculiar problems of the Northeast and Midwest which my friend from New York is so particularly interested in, not because it just makes sense for your constituents and mine, but because it makes a great deal of sense for us to meet our international defense needs, and the particular needs of our constituents, whether they are in Birmingham, Ala., or the western part of New York or upstate Michigan, or central Ohio.

We need a new policy. I know my friend will be helpful in that regard. I thank him for bringing this matter to our attention.

Mr. LUNDINE. I think the gentleman has contributed significantly to this discussion, both with the three criteria that he suggests and the specific example of the opportunity for joint research and development at least, are examples of how we can more intelligently apply modern-day principles to our antitrust policy in a way that will promote competition and efficiency and in a way that will make us really world-class competitors.

I thank him sincerely for his contribution.

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman from New York for calling this special order to discuss the increasing amount of merger activity occurring in this country.

Merger activity has tended to occur in waves. The first major wave, estimated to have involved 15 percent of all manufacturing plants and employees took place around the turn of the century. Giants such as du Pont and United States Steel grew out of this period of horizontal consolidations.

The second merger wave began in 1916 and ended with the 1929 stock market collapse. During this period, firms secondary to the dominant ones undertook mergers that transformed some industries into oligopolies dominated by a few large companies.

In the mid- to late 1960's, a new merger wave took place, distinguished from its predecessors by its conglomerate nature. The theory behind this wave was that a good managerial team could take over and capably handle any type of business, and improve it.

In the late 1970's, another merger wave started rolling in and we are currently being engulfed by it. While some mergers are necessary and a healthy economic development, mergers in and of themselves are not always good for the business community or for the public at large.

The history of corporate growth teaches that mergers have both benefits and costs. On the plus side, mergers sometimes generate economic efficiencies, sometimes eliminate managerial complacency, sometimes reduce consumer costs and sometimes even strengthen the international position of the United States.

However, there are serious economic costs that can be associated with large corporate mergers. Through market concentration they can encourage anticompetitive, anticonsumer behavior. And financing large mergers can reduce the pool of available loan funds and lead to high interest rates.

Absentee ownership can be another adverse result of a merger. When the headquarters of the parent company is miles away from the subsidiary, such absentee corporations often do not have the sense of commitment and community pride that home-grown enterprises do. Important decisions concerning subsidiaries made in faraway headquarters are more likely to be made without regard to the needs of the subsidiary's local employees, the local community, or the concerns of local officials. This kind of disregard of employees' interests is one thing that is perpetuating workers' hostility toward management and injuring our national productivity.

The high level wheeling and dealing which accompanies these big merger deals usually does nothing to benefit society or the economy. Managers engaged in corporate empire building are often distracted from doing what they should be doing to keep the existing company strong. And target managers, attempting to fight off hostile merger moves, are distracted too and frequently end up doing things that they would not otherwise do, such as selling off the company's best assets, in order to fend off the takeover. If such corporate aggrandizement continues to replace sound management, then the time may come when the Government, for the sake of productivity and competition, will take an even greater role in controlling mergers. I certainly would not want to see that happen, but I am afraid that the continued trend toward unnecessary, unrestrained consolidations will provoke a movement toward more Government regulation.

Attention in the past couple of months has been focused on the acquisitions taking place in the oil industry. During that time, Mobil, the Nation's third largest industrial firm, has arranged to take over the Superior Oil Co., the 52d largest corporation in terms of assets. Texaco, the Nation's 4th largest industrial firm, has obtained FTC approval for its takeover of the 24th ranked Getty Oil Co. And in what would be the world's largest takeover ever, Standard Oil of California, itself the seventh largest industrial corporation, has made a $13.4 billion offer to acquire the Gulf Oil Co., the Nation's ninth largest industrial firm.

In the last 3 years, the five largest mergers in history have taken place, and each one of them has involved at least one oil company:

Gulf/Socal; Getty/Texaco; Conoco/Du Pont; Marathon/United States Steel; and Superior/Mobil.

Maybe this is just a result of inflation. But surely in addition to that factor, the laissez faire attitude of the current administration toward mergers has invited much of this takeover activity.

The former Attorney General for Antitrust, William Baxter, sat before the House Judiciary Committee a couple of years ago and said that in his opinion, it would be all right if all of the industry in this country was controlled by 100 corporations. That gave a strong, but wrong, signal to Wall Street.

This is not to say that some mergers are not justified. Mergers among corporations have an important role in our economy. However, until the Reagan administration came to power, concentration of corporate power in this country had been traditionally disfavored unless it appeared that there were no likely adverse effects on the economy. Now one can wonder whether any coherent set of guideposts are being followed with regard to mergers.

For instance, the Federal Trade Commission approved the $10 billion Texaco/Getty merger even though that corporate marriage threatens the viability of the independent sector of the industry in California by limiting or denying access of crude oil and pipeline transportation. Speculation is that the Socal/Gulf and Mobil/Superior mergers will also be approved by the FTC.

However, the biggest merger before the Justice Department in recent times did not have such easy sailing. Even though the steel industry is in big trouble, the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, now directed by a new Assistant Attorney General, Paul McGrath, recently said "no" to the proposed acquisition of Republic Steel by LTV Corp. For doing so, he was publicly chastised by the President, the Secretary of Commerce, and the special trade representative. Shortly thereafter, Mr. McGrath agreed to a slightly altered merger by the two steel companies.

I have no opinion on the merits of this particular merger. It may very well be that this consolidation will be beneficial to the steel industry and the country as a whole. But I am troubled by the problem of intervention at the highest level. No one questions the power of the President to nominate and remove Federal law enforcement officials, nor to set general antitrust guidelines and policies. But when the President and other Cabinet level officials step in as they did in this case, a serious doubt is cast on the independence of the law enforcement agency.

Independent and evenhanded enforcement of our Nation's laws is vital if citizens are to have confidence in the integrity of our institutions and our system of justice.

Besides the susceptibility of the process to political intervention, the failure of leadership of the administration to speak with one voice and deal consistently with aspects of industrial policy and competition is complicating the merger problem.

The gentleman from New York certainly understands the importance of the need to look at our industrial policy as a whole and act on the basis of a national economy strategy, rather than on a piecemeal, ad hoc basis as we currently do. He has been one of the leaders in efforts to get Congress to adopt legislation creating a national body made up of people from industry, labor, Government, and academia to develop and follow broad, consistent economic policies. Currently our economic policy is all over the place. We have it in the Department of Justice, the Department of Commerce, the FTC, to name only a few. We have it in the form of tax credits, antitrust laws, trade subsidies, again to name only a few. There are probably over 400 different overlapping, competing, conflicting, totally unintegrated industrial policies. It is a very uncoordinated state of affairs with no rhyme or reason to it.

If we could establish a way to coordinate Government's policies, then I think part of the merger problem we now face would be resolved. With respect to the matters now at hand, we would be able to better analyze the problems of both the oil and steel industries and, taking all factors into account, determine whether industry consolidation is appropriate and beneficial. The market itself cannot always do this.

For instance, in the case of the oil industry mergers, I am concerned about the consequences of reduced oil exploration. The reason underlying the current oil merger wave is the desire to buy existing oil reserves rather than explore for new ones. This is the sort of nonproductive financial manipulation which is contributing to the decline in growth of our entire economy and I find it very disturbing. I am convinced that if these acquiring oil companies take on the massive level of debt necessitated by the takeovers, there will be less exploration. But is that an appropriate concern of the antitrust enforcers? It may not be, but it is certainly a national policy concern and ought to be considered in determining whether such mergers should go forward.

To raise another problem, the United States is no longer a closed economy, if it ever was. Certainly today international competition is an extremely strong factor. In the case of the steel industry, the impact of worldwide competition cannot be ignored. But while everyone recognizes that the United States is not an isolated market, how international trade should be taken into account in terms of the antitrust laws is not a simple matter. But, again, it is a matter of national policy concern which must be considered in determining whether some mergers should go forward.

The inability of the Government to take an overall look at the myriad of Federal industrial policy is being felt very acutely in the antitrust field. Mr. Baxter's attitude that 100 companies could own all industry in America is not the answer; it strikes me instead as being total abdication.

Rather than go back to 19th century laissez faire policies, we should try to develop some contemporary policies which make sense. Where the marketplace is functioning properly, then let it continue to do so. But where it is not, we need to develop some way of dealing with the problem.

In addition to cosponsoring the industrial policy legislation introduced by Mr. LUNDINE and Mr. LAFALCE, I have introduced legislation dealing specifically with the merger and antitrust concerns we have been expressing here today.

The Domestic Petroleum Company Acquisition Act of 1984, H.R. 5042, which I introduced in March, would prohibit major oil companies from acquiring control of other major oil companies or mid-sized domestic energy concerns. I have been studying the oil industry for several years and am persuaded that this bill represents sound national policy. I believe that unrestrained mergers between huge companies in one of our largest and key industries suppress the threat of vigorous competition and endanger America's energy independence, economic pluralism, and productive drive.

I also joined House Judiciary Committee Chairman PETER RODINO in introducing H.R. 3561 last July. This bill attempts to deal with the excesses associated with large corporate acquisitions by establishing a public interest standard which very large proposed mergers would have to meet in order to go forward. This legislation would broaden the existing Clayton Act merger test by giving the Justice Department and the Federal Trade Commission the authority to scrutinize any proposed merger which would result in an entity with assets in excess of $5 billion or employees in excess of 25,000 and determine whether it is unlikely that the merger would serve the public interest. In order to make that determination, the agency would delay the acquisition for 60 days while it looks at factors such as the impact on management and employees, the amount of transactional costs involved, the effect on productivity, and the likelihood that competition will be enhanced. If, in weighing the potential benefits against the likely costs, the agency determines that the proposed merger will result in a positive benefit to society, it would not attempt to obtain injunctive relief.

Mr. Speaker, if our economy is to fully recover, and our productivity and our competitive posture in the world improve, we must remove the obstacles which merger mania presents. Passage of bills such as these would be a step in that direction.●

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate Representative LUNDINE for organizing this aptly titled special order on "merger mania." Before other companies are swept along or consumed by the merger craze, we need to pause and ask where these mergers will take the economy and how they will affect the average consumer. I think we will find that the passionate desire to merge is perilous both to the economy and the consumer.

Let us look at oil mergers as an example. Big oil companies are literally devouring each other. Already this year, three oil companies have bid a total of $29.1 billion to purchase competitors. Standard Oil bid $13.2 billion to acquire Gulf, the largest merger in American corporate history; Mobil bid $5.7 billion for Superior, and Texaco bought Getty for $10.1 billion. These merger bids constitute nearly twice the amount the entire domestic oil industry spent exploring for new oil and gas in 1982. And their appetites are consuming up to 13 percent of private capital available to finance business ventures.

Even worse, these mergers do not make the United States energy independent. No new oil will be discovered. No new jobs are created. Oil wells simply change hands, resulting in larger and fewer companies, charging higher prices.

It is clear that we in the House must take the lead in halting this merger mania. My colleague from Ohio, JOHN SEIBERLING, has introduced legislation (H.R. 5042) to rein in these oil mergers. The bill would prohibit major oil companies from acquiring control of other major oil companies or midsized domestic energy concerns. The oil companies may not like this bill, but consumers do, especially consumers like those in my district who have been battered by constantly rising energy costs.

More generally, Congress must take steps to eliminate Government subsidization of mergers. Currently, when a corporation borrows money to acquire another company, it can deduct the interest expense from its Federal tax return. Thus, in effect, the Treasury can subsidize over 40 cents of every dollar in interest costs a company incurs in a takeover. Congressman DORGAN has introduced a bill, H.R. 3137, which would deny any deduction for interest paid or incurred on loans in connection with large corporate takeovers. This legislation deserves speedy passage.

For a more detailed analysis of oil mergers and why they must be halted, I would like to insert in the RECORD excerpts from the excellent testimony of Michael Pertschuk before the Senate Judiciary Committee on March 15, 1984. Mr. Pertschuk is the former Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission and currently an FTC Commissioner.

EXCERPTS FROM TESTIMONY OF MICHAEL PERTSCHUK

The rush of oil companies to merge is radically restructuring the industry. Never before have such massive companies amassed such formidable lines of credit to acquire competitors of such strength and size. This consolidation is taking place in that industry which contains the very largest corporations in the country. Six of the top ten industrial corporations in the U.S. are oil companies.

There is little doubt that the current merger wave has been triggered in large part by the administration's lax antitrust policies. Business Week reported on February 6 that "the Reagan Administration's hands-off policy has been, in effect, enabling legislation for the current merger wave." Nine of the ten largest mergers in history (whether or not Socal-Gulf is included) have occurred during this administration, as shown in the table below.

10 LARGEST CORPORATE MERGERS

Eight of the ten mergers involve oil and gas companies. And the epidemic of large oil mergers is hardly spent. The March 7, 1984 Wall Street Journal reports industry analysts are targeting a list of second tier takeover candidates, including Pennzoil, Phillips 66, Superior, Kerr-McGee, Hess and Sun. As you know, since that report, Mobil has agreed to buy Superior for $5.7 billion.

In the face of this radical restructuring of the oil industry, virtually no policy proposals or even questions emerge from the Reagan administration. The most that we see from the antitrust agencies, the Commerce Department and the Department of Energy is passive spectatorship, coupled by occasional attempts to justify after-the-fact the latest acquisition. Energy Secretary Hodel said recently: "An argument could be made by Texaco that, in order to compete effectively with Exxon, they need to acquire a smaller company like Getty." With all due respect to Secretary Hodel, justifying a merger by a company with $47 billion in sales to compete with a company with $95 billion in sales gives new meaning to economies of scale. If taken seriously, it would justify two-company industries throughout the economy.

But we need more than wishful speculation that everything must be alright because the free market produced it. Yet the administration opposes oil merger legislation, its antitrust standards are the flimsiest in history, it suggests no serious study of the ramifications for reducing exploration, it gives no hint that it is cognizant of the distortive impact of the tax code on stimulating mergers, it expresses no concern about tying up capital when the capital markets are squeezed dry by federal borrowing. In short, no one in the executive branch is minding the store, and any steps to address this onrush of acquisitions will have to be taken by Congress. I continue to believe that Congress should enact specific limitations on oil company mergers while we gain answers to a number of crucial questions about the long-term effects of these mergers, particularly while this administration is blissfully unconcerned.

ANTITRUST CONCERNS

There are two sources of concern over these mergers—antitrust concerns over threats to competition in particular markets and industrial policy issues which fall outside the traditional focus of antitrust, including diversion of capital from more productive uses. Let me turn first to the antitrust issues.

Each oil merger presents different factual circumstances and therefore must be examined individually by the antitrust agencies.

It is possible, however, to make some observations about generic antitrust problems that end to flow from large oil company mergers and to gain some insights about why the current administration's policies have not deterred them.

First, most recent oil mergers are driven by the desire for crude oil, which is much cheaper to acquire on Wall Street than through exploration and drilling. This powerful incentive was apparent when Mobil tried to buy Marathon's rich Yates field by acquiring control of Marathon. A 1982 FTC Staff Report concluded: ". . . there was no indication that Mobil would have been able to produce oil from the Yates field more cheaply, or that Mobil could reduce its other costs of operation significantly through ownership of this source of crude oil." Our staff, in analyzing the Texaco-Getty merger, again concluded that the only reason Texaco wanted to buy Getty was to gain control of its crude and related mineral resources. Further, Ernst von Metzch, an oil analyst with the Wellington Management Company, told the New York Times: "The fact that you buy these reserves for only four or five dollars a barrel at the stock market is important. You don't have to take the risks of drilling, which often involves exploration costs of more than $10 a barrel."

One of the central arguments defending oil mergers is that the industry, particularly at the level of crude reserves and production, is not highly concentrated. I agree that a conventional analysis of horizontal concentration shows an industry which is much less concentrated than steel or autos, for example. However, the antitrust concerns over crude acquisitions in cases that have arisen so far have not focused on the horizontal concentration of crude reserve assets, but on a "vertical" problem—the threat to depriving the independent sector of the industry of loss of crude and refined product supplies. The FTC staff—and on occasion the FTC Commissioners themselves—have acknowledged there are such vertical problems, but the Reagan Commission has largely ignored them. The result has been a perfect blending of oil company desires and administration antitrust policy. The administration has focused on requiring limited divestitures in the "downstream" markets for wholesale distribution, pipelines and refineries, leaving the oil companies free to pursue their goal: acquisition of crude oil reserves. This accounts for the anomaly of the administration claiming tough antitrust action, while the pace of oil mergers accelerates.

This pattern is illustrated by the Commission's experience in the Mobil-Marathon attempted merger in December 1981. The Commission split 2-2 on whether to challenge Mobil's gaining control of Marathon's crude oil and refining assets. Chairman Miller's position, and the one the Commission argued in court, was to state expressly that the acquisition would not be objectionable if Mobil arranged a divestiture of Marathon's transportation, storage, and marketing assets. Commissioner Bailey and I dissented on the grounds that Chairman Miller's position ignored the "vertical" problem that Mobil would not follow Marathon's traditional pattern of supplying independents, particularly gasoline marketers. While the Commission was formulating this plan to save the acquisition, Mobil raced to find a buyer for the downstream assets. Unfortunately for Mobil, but fortunately for the rest of us, a private suit resulted in enjoining the acquisition, and the Commission ended up a bystander.

How important is the independent sector of the oil industry. The 1982 FTC staff report noted that the independents' share of gasoline sales in the country increased from 23 percent to 35 percent by 1980. In some local markets, of course, the share of independents is substantially higher. And, even if the share is in the 20-30 percent range, off-brand stations can impose a healthy price disciplining impact on the major integrated company's pricing policies. As the FTC staff report stated: "Independents have traditionally tended to induce price competition in markets."

By emphasizing the threat of cutting off the independents, I do not mean to suggest that horizontal concentration of crude reserves is not entirely free from risk from an antitrust standpoint. It is unlikely that there is a textbook fluid world market for crude oil, in which crude flows freely to reestablish demand and supply equilibria over the entire planet. The world is, for better or worse, much more complicated than that. As we are painfully aware, OPEC—when conditions give it market power—restrains supply. We are still subject to random oil "shocks" from reductions in supply from abroad. The fact that lightning has not struck lately does not mean that lightning cannot strike again. There are also periodic calls for import taxes on imported oil for other national policy reasons. These considerations all mean that we should be concerned about domestic as well as world concentration although crude oil concentration at the national level is still moderate, as noted in the attached Table taken from the FTC staff report.

The evidence also suggests that there is not a single market for crude oil, even within the United States. As the 1982 FTC Staff Report notes, there may be particular geographic and product markets for crude oil within the U.S.[5] For example, previous FTC staff investigations strongly suggested that low quality crude oil in the west coast area was a separate market with particular supply and demand considerations.

An additional consideration in evaluating the apparent current policy of insisting on downstream divestitures but acquiescing in crude oil acquisitions is that the traditional remedy of divestiture may not lead to creating viable competitors from assets which are "spun off." The Texaco-Getty consent agreement, for example, requires that Texaco sell off refining pipeline and marketing assets within 12 months. If the consent agreement is finalized, the FTC can do its best to insure Texaco finds a buyer and that the divested assets will be used productively, but the FTC can't guarantee that result. In most antitrust cases, the divestiture remedy works reasonably well, but in a highly integrated industry, where established sources of supply may not be easily replaced, it is reasonable to be concerned about whether the assets Texaco sells off will be as productive as before.

Finally, the oil industry has been historically prone to collusion. The Commission's 1973 complaint against the major oil companies alleged a series of structural and conduct problems in the industry to be unfair methods of competition. When the Commission dismissed the complaint in 1981, it did so not on the grounds that the staff had failed to uncover any evidence to support these allegations but that the case had become too complex and bogged down to expect a resolution in the near future. In short, the Exxon case burst the seams of manageable litigation.

The degree of vertical integration, the ability of a few companies to influence supply and demand at one level of the system by controlling another level, the prevalence of exchange agreements, the frequency of joint ventures, the degree of information exchange, the pervasiveness of joint pipeline ownership, the tax incentives which encourage major companies to divert crude through their own vertically integrated operations, the incentives of the major companies to eliminate the independent sector of the industry, and the not infrequent historic examples of price-fixing in the past all suggest this industry is far from the textbook model. A simple assessment of horizontal market shares may miss the vast forest of potentially anticompetitive phenomena.

In summary, the evidence suggests two conclusions about antitrust concerns. First, antitrust problems can arise in the oil industry from crude oil acquisitions, even though horizontal concentration is not high, because of the problem of cutting off traditional sources of supplies to the independent sector. Second, the oil industry is not only massive in size but it is exceedingly complex. The industry is far from the textbook model and mergers, including those at the crude oil level, must often be assessed on a much more specific basis than worldwide or even domestic horizontal concentration.

CONCERNS OUTSIDE ANTITRUST

The traditional concern of antitrust is competition within particular markets. The legislative history of the antitrust laws shows clearly a Congressional concern about higher prices to consumers from anticompetitive conduct. Similarly, the antitrust laws and court decisions interpreting them reflect a deep commitment to maintaining rivalry among diverse competitors, to preserving consumer choice, to protecting smaller competitors from unfair predatory behavior, and to avoiding undue concentrations of economic and political power. While it is difficult to apply some of these principles on a case-by-case basis these values can and should be incorporated into general antitrust principles and rules.

On the other hand, some problems associated with business combinations fall outside traditional antitrust analysis. Since concerns about capital investment and corporate waste are not traditional antitrust issues, the antitrust agencies will not take these factors into account in any direct way in deciding to challenge a particular merger. Consequently, if Congress believes there are significant problems that need to be addressed in this area—and I believe there are—legislation will be needed.

Do oil companies divert capital from exploration and other productive investment when they use billions of dollars in cash and credit to buy other firms? The answer is almost certainly yes. In lining up a credit line to buy Gulf, Mesa noted that its capital spending plans for 1984 had to be cut in half. Oil companies openly admit that they need new reserves and among the two choices—drilling or buying another company—merging is cheaper. Our staff found the exclusive motive for the Texaco-Getty acquisition was to gain control of Getty's crude oil.

Unlike an investment to build a factory, which is allocated to paying construction costs and buying machinery, the capital used to acquire a company is simply transferred to other hands and becomes available for investment. Thus, one can argue that the $10 billion used to buy Getty will still be invested, if not in oil, then elsewhere in the economy. But a more important question, for purposes of assessing the long run productivity of the oil industry, is whether the likelihood of investment in further exploration and development of oil is as high when windfall gains on oil stocks end up in the hands of individuals, institutions or other firms, particularly those outside the industry. I know of no definitive studies, but it is reasonable to assume that much less of this capital will go to such development. The firms likely to explore for oil are the firms which are committed to the business of selling oil, not the individuals and institutions which profit from oil stocks shooting up. We should also recall that one of the arguments by the oil industry for decontrol of oil prices was that the industry needed incentives for developing new reserves, and one of the ironies of current policy is that companies are using profits from decontrol to buy the oil of their competitors.

There are other important issues outside of antitrust raised by big oil mergers, including the management resources wasted in takeover fights and the tying up of capital in lines of credit in preparation for takeovers which may or may not occur. We need to know more about these issues. In fact, one of the more troublesome aspects of the rush to merge is that the administration not only neglects antitrust enforcement but it shows a casual indifference to even studying the implications of the massive consolidations.

I believe there is ample justification for Congress to impose some temporary limitation on big oil mergers to enable Congress and the Executive Branch to gain understanding of this raging phenomenon. If these mergers really enhance productivity—and are not merely a reaction to a window of opportunity caused by lax enforcement and depressed stock values—a limited moratorium will only delay for a short time an industry restructuring which can continue to take place. But if, as seems more likely, these mergers promise only windfall profits to lucky shareholders and a device for eliminating the need to explore for oil by the majors, while threatening to reduce competition, Congress should act, and the sooner the better.

What type of legislation is warranted? I agree with the conception of a moratorium, but I would urge Congress to impose moratorium that is long enough for serious study, long enough to insure that a useful and comprehensive anaysis is undertaken rather than prompting executive branch agencies to defend the administration's policies under the guise of objective anaysis. Consequently, I suggest that Congress create a national Commission to study both the antitrust and industrial policy ramifications of consolidations in the oil industry. The Commission could be made up of members appointed equally by the President, the House of Representatives and the Senate. Such a Commission should be allowed a reasonable period for a serious, comprehensive study—a period which would necessarily require at least one year. Thus, a moratorium of eighteen months would be required to allow Congress the time to act.

Some will argue that a moratorium of a year and a half on massive oil mergers is too long. But can one really argue that the American public will suffer from the loss of "efficiencies"—now inchoate but promising to stimulate significant gains in productivity—if this phenomenon is halted for this limited period. I submit that the productivity arguments are so speculative and the likelihood of lasting harm from the massive consolidations so high that the nation would be best served by a serious attempt to answer these crucial questions, before the damage becomes irremediable.●

WILL THIS CONGRESS DEAL WITH THE BUDGETARY CRISIS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the one thing that most Americans acknowledge at the present time is that this Nation, in terms of its Federal Government, faces a serious budgetary crisis.

As of tomorrow, on this House floor, we supposedly will begin the process of facing up to that budgetary crisis. Supposedly on this House floor tomorrow we will begin debating what is necessary to do in order to alleviate that budgetary crisis in the near term and in the far term.

Having seen the debate emerge in recent weeks, both the debate that has been carried by the news media of the country, and the debate that is taking place in this Chamber behind the scenes, one has to wonder whether or not we really are going to deal with the budgetary crisis, or whether or not we are simply going to once again come up with a bunch of phony figures that are relatively meaningless and purport to have done something serious.

My guess is that what we do tomorrow will not be a very serious matter with regard to the effects of what we do tomorrow. Because, bottom line, I doubt that we will do anything which will, in the long term, affect spending, affect taxes, or ultimately, change budget priorities.

I think we can begin by asking if we did anything to follow last year's budget. We went through quite an exercise here on the floor last year, supposedly coming to grips with the budgetary problems. Supposedly coming to grips with the massive deficits, and I would ask whether or not we came anywhere close to following last year's budget. The way in which we came up with budget deficits that looked better than what the administration had in their budget last year was we put in a whole bunch of revenue increases. We had a whole bunch of tax increases down in the budget. That allowed the majority party to say that they were going to get the deficits under control; they were going to do a better job than the administration in controlling these deficits. In fact, they voted for a budget deficit that was lower than what the administration had offered.

The problem was that the budget deficit was not based upon cutting spending and doing those things which really deal with the problem, it was based on tax increases. That, of course, meant that they had to get the tax increases passed. Did they get any of them passed? Absolutely not. Not one of the tax increases got passed.

So, as a result, what we ended up with was taking their much higher spending figures, and they were higher almost across the board compared to what the administration's program had. We took their much higher spending figures; we included those in what we appropriated around here; we said that all these appropriations that were coming out were within the budget, and indeed they were, because they were within a budget that was much higher than it otherwise would have been. Then we did not pass any tax increases, so what we did was we aggravated the budget deficits; we did not subtract from it.

That was our performance last year based upon this budget process that we go through. In fact, what we do around here is we take everybody's highest figures. If the administration wants to spend more in some areas such as defense, what we end up doing most of the time around here is taking their higher figures and then if Congress wants to spend more in some other area, we take their highest figures.

How do we do that? How do we get around the Budget Act, which supposedly puts some controls into the process, and supposedly says that we cannot spend beyond what we say we are going to spend? Well, we come out to the floor with something called budget waivers. Every time we want to spend more than what the budget calls for, we simply bring a rule to the House floor that says we are going to waive the Budget Act.

Rule after rule, over the last year, waived the Budget Act and simply went on spending as though the budget did not exist. We do that consistently, and on several occasions some of us have tried to get votes on those rules to find out whether or not all these people who talk about budget deficits and all these people who say that they are really against spending too much money or they really want to do something about balancing the budget, to find out whether or not they want to waive the Budget Act and thereby go along our merry way spending as much as we want to anyhow.

Sure enough, rule after rule passes. As a matter of fact, I do not think one of them has been turned down. I think every time we have had a budget waiver out here in a rule, that that rule has passed with the budget waiver in it. Why is that? Well, because Congress really is not intending to do anything about budget deficits in terms of the reality of spending around here.

We want to debate budgets here tomorrow, and that is what we will go through. We will go through an exercise of debating budgets tomorrow and on Thursday, and then say that we have done our bit for the balanced budget; we approved a budget which supposedly lowers the deficits a little bit, when in fact that is not what we do at all.

What we will be faced with here on the floor will be another kind of charade because we will essentially have the minority's "tweedle-dee" budget versus the majority's "tweedle-dum" budget. Now the majority's tweedle-dum budget may have a few little different things in it than the tweedle-dee budget from the minority side, but the fact is that neither of them are going to go very far toward really eliminating massive deficits for the future.

So we will talk as though the end of the world is going to take place in financial matters if we do not approve our tweedle-dee budget versus their tweedle-dum budget. But the fact is, they are not very much different.

The American people might wonder why are they not very much different. Well, because the whole budget process starts with a lot of phony premises. First of all, we start with baseline figures that have no basis in reality. The baseline figures are developed by the Congressional Budget Office which has in many cases its own kind of political scenario, and its own kind of wishes about what it wants done in the budget.

So, therefore, beginning with the process tomorrow, the forms that I have tell me that we are going to begin dealing with a Budget Committee baseline of $206.8 billion for fiscal year 1985. That is where the Budget Committee says we have to start, despite the fact that a number of economists across the country, people who are actually paid for their advice and so, therefore, have to be right at least part of the time, and around here no one has to be right any of the time, but out in the business world some of them have to depend upon their reputations to make a little money, a lot of them are now coming forward and saying that the growth that is taking place in the economy right now is substantially lowering the deficit figures.

That is not to say that deficits have become a nonworry. They have not. They are still massively high, much too high, and we ought to be dealing with them. But the fact is that that $206 billion figure does not take the present growth into account. The budget figures may well be about $40 billion lower than that as a result of growth that has taken place over the last several months.

So, therefore, if we start from a phony baseline we are going to come up with phony figures, and the American people ought to recognize that that is, in fact, what we do around here consistently. We come up with a bunch of phony figures.

The other thing that we do around here is, we assume that everything which is now in place in the Federal budget is sacrosanct; so, therefore, it cannot be touched, so any baseline figure we come up with is a consistent spending pattern with no reform. In fact, we do not want to include any growth into the criteria, we do not want to include any reform, because if we did that it might warp the process and somebody might actually come up with a reform budget of some sort that would actually, then, force us to look at those reforms in the future.

We should not, for instance, suggest that the tax system might well be revised substantially and thereby get some additional revenues in not by raising the rate of taxation on the American people, but by bringing money out of the underground economy through something like a flat-rate tax. But we are really not allowed to suggest those kinds of reforms because this is a no-growth scenario that we bring out here. It is a phony.

By accepting that which is, and accepting no reform, then we lock into place that all of these programs have somehow complied with the budget. After the budget process is finished, we will hear every program brought to the floor and some committee chairman, or somebody who is a proponent of this program, will come to the floor and say, "Well, of course, this complies with the budget," and if anybody offers something which is different than that, they will say, "Well, we do not know the budget impact of that. So, therefore, you are wrong in offering reforms because the budget impact of that is an unknown quantity. We bring before you something which complies with the budget."

So what we are doing here is setting policy, then, when we adopt this budget. We are setting policy based upon phony criteria and locking us into that phony criteria and that phony budget for the entire year that follows.

I would suggest that the American people are something less than satisfied with what we do in this Government, and they are something less than satisfied with what goes on in this Congress, and they are something less than satisfied with the programs that are operating out across the country that are fraught with waste and abuse. They think that what we ought to be doing around here is doing some major reforms. They would be awfully disturbed to understand that the budget process that we will spend the next 2 days promulgating is really a process designed to defend that status quo. It is really a process designed to freeze in certain patterns of spending and not allow us to deal with those not only within the budget but outside the budget process either.

The entire system, in my view, is suspect. The entire system is based upon something which has not been and probably can never be, under the process that we have developed. If we take that phony budget process and we bring phony budgets to the floor and then we lock everything else in that we do in the future to those phony budgets, first of all that becomes suspect.

But second, then what we do is, we go into a process of uncontrolled appropriating to actually carry out the spending patterns of Government. The budget becomes a nonentity when we actually come to the appropriations, which are the actual level of spending.

We, of course, have a whole pattern of things around here. We not only budget, then we authorize spending and then we finally appropriate it. The appropriations that we come forward with are the actual levels of spending. Now, do you think we pay any attention to that budget when it comes to appropriating? Very little. If we need to, we will get a rule, as I mentioned earlier, and simply waive any spending that does not comply with the budget.

Beyond that, of course, the appropriations process is set up in such a way that we can include a lot of items in it that we never anticipated in the budget process. For instance, all the pork-barrel legislation that goes through here is usually tied to the appropriations bills. We sit around in committee and everybody gets a little hunk of port and sticks it down in the bill, and none of that was ever anticipated in the budget, but it is passed through here and obligates us forever after to spend money on some public works project that somebody powerful enough on some committee was able to get into the bill.

Also, we have a process around here known as supplemental appropriations. Supplemental appropriations are those add-ons to the spending after we have already appropriated for the year, so what we get here in the Congress is appropriations coming forward that are supposedly within the Budget Act, and we are told that, yes, this complies with the Budget Act, and then later on in the year we get some new appropriations coming forward under supplementals that, in fact, either carry us over the budget or carry us way beyond anything that the budget ever anticipated.

We get these supplementals out here that also aggravate the entire budgeting process. But the problem is that we have no discipline. The problem is that we came up with a budget process a while back which supposedly was going to effect some discipline but became a way of escaping discipline.

That is what we will begin a debate on here tomorrow. We will begin a debate on the House floor about a budget which probably has little basis in reality, which certainly will not be followed, and which in the end will probably, more than anything else, give us an excuse for spending which we ought not be doing.

I think in light of that, it becomes somewhat questionable that we should abrogate to the process tomorrow some overriding badge of authority and suggest that the budget is going to solve the fiscal woes of this country for the near term and for the long term. The fact is, it probably will not. It probably will not come anywhere close.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida, a member of the Committee on the Budget.

Mr. MACK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I was curious if, in looking at all of the different proposals that we have seen during the last several days, if there was anything in there that implied to you that there was something significant that was being done in this budget procedure this time?

Mr. WALKER. I would say to the gentleman no, we are not going to do anything significant. Most of the budget deficits subtract a little bit from what the President suggested as a budget deficit. They add on a little here and subtract a little there, but they do not really get to the bottom line.

The Democrats want to tax more than we want to tax. They want to spend more on domestic programs and less on defense, so they emasculate defense along the way in order to get more money for domestic programs. We would like to cut domestic programs a little bit more and save some of the money for defense, and probably still end up with too much money in both.

It is kind of a silly process all told.

Mr. MACK. If the gentleman will yield further, let me ask a question.

What would you try to accomplish, or what would you want to be the end result if you were putting a budget together? Would you want to have a budget that you could vote for where, at the end of the proceedings, you could say that because we either raised taxes or we cut spending or we did a little bit of both, that either we lowered interest rates in the country or we raised the level of economic growth; that is, the real level of economic growth, or that we put x millions of Americans back to work, that we sustained the growth for a longer period of time?

Would those be the kinds of goals that you would be trying to achieve?

Mr. WALKER. Absolutely, I would say to the gentleman. I think what we ought to be doing is adopting a budget that assures that we are going to have economic growth for the future and then assures that, as a part of that economic growth, we are going to have lower interest rates and that we are not going to place additional tax burdens on the backs of the people who are already carrying too much of a tax burden; namely, the working people of this country. That is what I would like to see happen.

The thing is that is what can happen, but the way the process is designed is to make certain that you are never really allowed to offer an alternative of that kind on the House floor because if you offer an alternative that suggests no new taxation, you are not allowed to take any additional growth factor in your budget for that. If you offer that kind of thing, you are not allowed to say that that will lower interest rates substantially because if you offered real reforms of that type and they in fact showed up in the budget as being real reforms, Congress might do something totally unacceptable and actually adopt such a budget and actually commit ourselves to lowering taxes as a route toward solving the budget deficit problem. We are not allowed within the context of the budget process to even consider those kinds of options, and that to me is one of the real problems with the way we proceed presently.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I can understand the reason for everyone starting someplace, so to speak, everyone accepting either using the House Budget Committee's baseline or the OMB's baseline or the Congressional Budget Office's baseline as maybe a place to begin so everything is judged from that, but it seems to me to be rather ridiculous to put together a budget, whether that calls for an increase of $25 billion in spending or $25 billion in revenues, and someone does not come forward at the same time and say, "Now, if we do that, I think what we will see is a reduction in the unemployment rate in the country or a reduction in interest rates."

We are going to see a budget document put together in these next several days which is in essence going to say that whatever we do really does not make any difference. The budget assumptions that are used in the beginning will be the budget assumptions that are used in the end.

What I am saying is there ought to be some motivation for going out and doing the difficult things that have to be done.

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is absolutely right. For example, we know that if you cut unemployment in this country—and all of us would like to design a budget that cuts the unemployment rate—we know that if you really cut the employment rate by, say, 2 points, you would save somewhere in the vicinity of $55 to $60 billion. In addition, you get an additional growth out of that, plus the fact that you would generate more revenues because of people working.

The way the budget is designed around here, you would not get an advantage out of that. To some extent it would be a disadvantage to you to cut unemployment by 2 points because that would not show up as having had any economic impact. And I am convinced that one of the reasons for that is that Congress does not want to design a process which suggests that if you do some of these things, it really results in a generation of wealth out in the country that shows up back here. What we really want to do is we want to have an option of spending all that additional revenue when it comes in. We want to be able to say that that has no bearing on deficits because we want to spend it.

In fact, that is what we have been doing with the economic growth that has been taking place here recently. The unemployment rate has come down a couple of points. That should have lowered the deficit by $55 to $65 billion. Has it? No; because we are spending the money. We are already taking off here and spending the money as it comes in, and we want to make certain we have a budget process that allows us to continue to spend the money.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman this question: The gentleman raised the point that this unemployment would come down 2 points—and if I recall correctly, we have seen unemployment drop from what, 10.4 to 7.8 percent?

Mr. WALKER. It was as high as 10.8 percent, and it has come down to about 7.8 percent. So it is down——

Mr. MACK. Three points, then?

Mr. WALKER. Yes; 2 to 3 points.

Mr. MACK. It would seem logical, then, that if the argument holds that you can equate what, roughly $30 billion either in reduced spending or increased revenues——

Mr. WALKER. Some people say $25 to $30 billion; $30 billion is certainly a reasonable figure.

Mr. MACK. Why would that not translate itself through as to what the budget deficit numbers are that we are looking at as a starting point? Why do we not have that budget deficit lower to start with?

Mr. WALKER. Well, we should. We are not seeing that because it is not to the advantage of the people who want to continue a process of taxing and spending around here to suggest that in fact economic growth based upon lower tax rates is something that we ought to be following. Instead, what they want to suggest is that if we lower taxes, that in fact brings about a loss of revenue which in fact then increases the deficit rather than reducing it.

The fact is that it is exactly the opposite. The lower tax rates have produced such economic growth that we are getting additional revenue in. There is more revenue flowing in, but we cannot show that in any budget for the present and for the future because again the process simply does not permit it. The process was designed for people who want to spend the money, not for people who want to save the money.

Mr. MACK. All right. I think there is another point that needs to be clarified. We keep hearing about the reductions in the deficit, and it is certainly possible that any of the programs that have been put together for presentation this year probably will reduce the deficits. Right?

Mr. WALKER. Perhaps.

Mr. MACK. The question that I would ask the gentleman is: Some people get the message that we have been able to reduce the deficits because we are cutting spending. I have not seen any spending cuts around here. What we are really talking about is that we are not going to spend as much as we said we were going to spend in previous years; is that true?

Mr. WALKER. Yes; we really do not reduce budgets at all. When we hear talk about cutting defense spending, they are not really cutting defense spending; they are cutting the rate of growth of defense spending. So we are trying to decide whether or not we are going to spend 10 percent over the inflation rate or whether we are going to spend 5 percent over the inflation rate. Everybody is talking about reducing spending there.

If we talk about reducing domestic programs, on our side of the aisle we hear the liberals tell us all the time about how we have emasculated domestic spending across the country with all the spending cuts that have taken place. There have been no real cuts in the vast majority of the programs. They have simply been reduced in what we thought we might spend on them.

So those are not real spending cuts either. As a result, the budget continues to go up and up and up, and the deficits continue to go up and up and up because everything we are doing around here is based upon phony assumptions.

Mr. MACK. The point is, though, whether we are talking about whether that might happen to be defense dollars or whether that might happen to be social spending, really when we say that we are going to reduce defense dollars by $40 billion over 3 years and they say that it is going to be $96 billion over 3 years, those really are not cuts; is that what the gentleman is saying? We are just deciding that we are going to be spending a little bit less than what we had planned to do?

Mr. WALKER. That is precisely the case. We have decided the rate of growth of spending is going to be reduced somewhat, and in reducing the rate of growth of spending, supposedly it has some impact on deficits. But it is a pretty minimal impact on deficits, and in fact if we do not follow the budget assumptions, as we did not last year, we end up increasing the deficit rather than decreasing it. The budget we adopted around here last year had a big revenue increase in it, and we thought because we had that big revenue increase, we could, therefore, increase spending for a lot of these programs. But we never got any of the revenue, so in fact we aggravated the budget deficit problem; we did not help it.

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I was just curious about this. I know that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Florida have spent a lot of time discussing the budget deficit crisis, and that is what I think it is. I am just curious.

What are the gentlemen suggesting we should do to deal with this $200 billion problem as far as the eye can see?

I am just curious; if you had your druthers and you could prepare a budget that would bring the deficit down for fiscal years 1985 and 1986 especially—let us look just 2 years into the future—how would the gentleman propose to do it?

Mr. WALKER. I think one of the basic things we could do would be to implement a vast majority of the Grace Commission recommendations to bring about real reforms in the programs. The gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) is suggesting that over the next 3 years we could save $131.9 billion by implementing the Grace Commission recommendations, and that over a 5-year period we could come up with about $319 billion in savings by implementing Grace Commission recommendations. And that does not even include all of them. That leaves out some of the ones like the ones in the retirement program, and so on, that would be particularly controversial. So that is one place we could begin.

I think another thing we could do within the budget context would be to pass a flat-rate tax plan that would begin to draw some of the money in from the underground economy and begin to allow us to have our revenue problems defined a little bit differently than we define them now with a large number of loopholes and a large number of tax shelters.

My own opinion is that that would be one thing that I would add to my budget presentation. Those things would allow us then to bring down interest rates fairly dramatically. If we implemented a good part of the Grace Commission's recommendations, that would do it.

The final thing I would do is I would limit the rate of growth of the Federal Government overall to the amount of growth of the economy as a whole. I do not think government should be growing faster than the economy as a whole grows that sustains that government. So therefore, I would put a cap on the amount of spending that we do at the Federal level to make certain that it is not any greater than the growth of the economy the previous year.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. MACK. The gentleman and I have had the opportunity in the past years to talk about entitlement programs. Around here when anybody mentions the words entitlement programs, they usually run, because they are either scared to death of what might happen as the result if someone were really to pursue that.

The gentleman has done some work which I think was a reasonable approach. As a result, I spent some time back home. I represent the oldest district in the country. I talked about what should be done about spending in social areas.

My reaction, I guess, to the gentleman's question is that I would attempt across the board to have an impact on all spending areas, not just defense, but entitlement programs and nondiscretionary spending programs.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has indicated, I think if we take something very serious about the process of trying to reduce spending and if we must, to increase revenues, if you can do enough to impact the deficit, which Paul Volcker says is $50 billion, you can affect interest rates by 1 percent and if you run those figures out, 1 percent decline in interest rate over a 5-year period is about $92 billion in reduced interest costs for the Federal Government.

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. SLATTERY. I conclude from what the gentleman says that he must believe there is a direct relationship between the size of deficits and interest rates then.

Mr. MACK. I would certainly have no problem at this point in agreeing with that, yes.

Mr. SLATTERY. I think that is a major concession on the part of many around here, because I think there are still some people that do not see that there is a direct relationship between the size of deficits and interest rates.

Mr. WALKER. Well, I cannot imagine there are very many people around here like that, unless they have been living under a rock somewhere, that do not understand that.

Mr. SLATTERY. I would say that maybe there have been some.

Mr. WALKER. I would say, though, that interest rates are also controlled by the Federal Reserve, that also makes decisions in an arbitrary way, that certainly the deficit problem is one of the calculations that they make; but we also have the Federal Reserve policies that set those interest rates. For example, I am convinced personally, based upon briefings I have been to over the course of the last couple years, that the Federal Reserve is artifically holding interest rates up right now to protect a lot of big money banks for the overseas debt that they have accumulated, I think irresponsibly over the last several years.

I think one of the reasons why we have interest rates at the present level is not just because of the deficit, but because the Federal Reserve has made a determination that they are going to prop up some of these money banks. I think that is wrong, and that is the policy we ought to take a look at, too.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MACK. May I say to the gentleman from Kansas just before he leaves, I think it is fair to try to expand on that discussion about interest rates as related to deficits. I do not think that we can make the argument that the $180 billion or $200 or $220 billion deficits in and of themselves are reason for a certain level of interest rates. I think we have to go back and look at the changes that we have made in our economy over the last several years; the deregulation of interest rates, for example, paid by commercial banks in this country. The cost of money to the commercial banks has gone up. To feel that for some reason those are not going to show up in what the gentleman and I or anyone else is going to pay in the form of interest rates on consumer loans or on a mortgage is putting one's head in the sand.

Mr. SLATTERY. I certainly would like to continue this discussion with the gentleman, because it is very enlightening; but the point I guess I would make is that I am one of those people who believes very strongly that the deficit is a critical national problem, is a threat to our national security; it is a threat to the economic stability of the Western world and it is clearly the issue of this decade.

I have to tell you that I am very disappointed that neither party and this Government, frankly, is addressing the issue to the extent it should.

I would like to see us leave here this year with a real payment in terms of reducing deficits in the neighborhood of $200 to $300 billion. Then I think we would really see some positive signs with regard to interest rates. I think interest rates would very easily come down substantially, perhaps, and it would really set the foundation for some solid economic growth that will extend beyond next November.

I concede to the gentleman that the relationship between deficits and interest rates is direct, but it is also affected by the business cycle, the economic cycle. It depends on what phase the business growth is in and a number of other factors; so there is not just this one factor that affects interest rates and I understand that. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman, too.

I guess one of the problems that some of us have with some of the philosophies we have around here that get themselves tied strictly to the idea of reducing deficits as being the principal goal is the fact that all too often that it is also said then that if you can add massive amounts of new revenue into the process, that in fact they end up showing they have reduced deficits, that you have in fact improved the economy.

Taxes take money out of the economy, just like increased spending and increased deficits and increased interest rates take money out of the economy; so it is one of the things that we have got to take a look at, and that is how do we reduce the deficit? It is very important that when you reduce the deficit, you do it largely by reducing the amount of overspending that the Federal Government does. You have to find some way to limit the growth of Government so that you can really do something about bringing down deficits that are out of hand because of too much spending.

The American people are not fundamentally undertaxed. They are fundamentally overtaxed. When we start talking about raising taxes in order to deal with deficits, we are piling our deficit burden that came about as the result of overspending here in this Congress on the backs of the American taxpayer. That is not fair and that is not a very good way to deal with the economy.

The best way to deal with the economy is to bring about some fiscal discipline here to reduce the amount of spending here, thereby bringing about lower deficits and a growing economy.

I would submit that one of the ways of doing that would be to do as we have asked to be done for the last 40 or more days on the House floor and that is bring to this floor the balanced budget amendment to the Constitution and allow us to get that into place. That would, in fact, place a discipline upon the Congress that is needed in order to deal with these issues realistically. That is the direction in which we have got to go in the future, rather than the direction we are going to go over the next couple days, which essentially will produce a phony budget because it was developed in a phony process.

I will be glad to yield further to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Let me just add what I think is another thing in addition to the concept of a balanced budget amendment that we ought to be working toward. As the gentleman knows, I am now into my second year here and this is the second budget process I have gone through. I spent most of the last 4½ to 5 months kind of working on some budget alternatives myself so that I would have a better understanding of what the Members were doing and a better understanding of the various programs and the assumptions that are made about the various programs, how they spend out and how we affect those programs if we cut certain levels, a lot of different what I would call at this point kind of an educational process that I have gone through.

Mr. WALKER. I would say that the gentleman did some of the most comprehensive work that I have seen done around here in the 8 years that I have been around the Congress. The gentleman is to be congratulated for the kind of work that he did. I saw the product of some of those efforts and he really did produce a lot of figures that were instructive to a lot of us who have been around here a lot longer than the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. I appreciate those kind words, but let me carry it on a step further.

One of the other things that came to my attention for the conclusion that I drew from the work was that we are really asking the wrong questions around here. We are asking, how do we affect entitlement programs, instead of saying how do we go about affecting what causes inflation? We have a tendency to go around and talk about how we changed the formula for the automatic cost of living adjustments. We get into that kind of debate.

An interesting question that comes up all the time is that we hear the discussion about the budget process usually in the terms of how much revenue are we going to raise or how much spending are we going to cut? Very little emphasis is placed on that third alternative, and that third alternative is how much economic growth are you going to create? You do not just create that because you want to. You do not create it just by wishing it. You can only create it if you begin to find out and ask the questions about what factors impact economic growth and let me give you just a short dialog on that.

Mr. WALKER. Well, the gentleman realizes, of course, one reason those questions never come up is because economic growth has no place in our budget process. You cannot put economic growth into the budget process, so therefore we do not discuss it, regardless of how important it is, because it is a part of what I have described as a phony process.

I will be glad to continue to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MACK. During the discussion that I had with Paul Volcker at one of the budget hearings I asked him what was a level of economic growth that he felt that this Nation could sustain. I am talking again in real terms, real economic growth.

His response was basically the level somewhere between the OMB or administration projection and the projection that was made by the Congressional Budget Office, somewhere between 3.3 percent real growth and 4 percent real growth.

The next question I asked was what would one have to do, or why could we not get the growth level up any higher than that?

The response back was basically because of problems with productivity and capacity. And capacity, you know, is the capability to produce goods and services.

It seems to me that the two questions that ought to immediately come after that is what do you do to impact a greater capacity and what do you do to get a greater, higher level of productivity. If one could answer those two questions, that is if you could move from 3.3 percent real economic growth to 4.3 percent real economic growth or 5 percent where you could sustain it at a level of that magnitude, without inflation, that you could end up putting more people back to work and you would end up creating greater revenues for the Federal Government, and many of the projects that people want to see get done would in fact be done.

But, no, we do not spend our time around here talking about how does one really raise the level of economic growth. We spend our time around here talking about H.R. 4170, or we talk about how much we are going to cut out of one particular spending program that turns out not to be a cut at all; it turns out to be a smaller raise in the level of spending.

The whole debate is totally confusing and does not have any impact on the economy, which is proven out by the document that they put together year after year.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would simply say that we are going to begin the budget process tomorrow and I would hope that we will accomplish more than we have accomplished in the past, but I doubt it.

I yield back the balance of my time.

BILINGUAL EDUCATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Puerto Rico (Mr. CORRADA) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, today I am proud to join my colleagues in speaking out in strong support of a program of vital importance to the interests of our democracy, and the concept of full participation by each individual in our society. Bilingual education, also known as title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, is the lone vehicle through which many children of limited English proficiency become familiar with the language of our schools, our workplaces, and our Government. On behalf of the 3.6 million limited-English-proficiency students currently enrolled in the Nation's schools, I am here to tell you how effective this program has been over the years of its existence.

Whenever the debate centers on the issue of bilingual education, we repeatedly hear the insidious myth that most Hispanic children do not want to learn English and that their parents want them educated only in their native language. If we adopt bilingual instruction as an educational policy, they say, we will create a bilingual society. And the bilingual education act is the tool with which these goals can be achieved. Nothing could be further from the truth.

I, for one, have never met a Hispanic parent or student who stood in favor of delaying acquisition of English. As a matter of fact, the Hispanic culture is known for the importance it gives to education, and for the emphasis it places on achievement of its children. I cannot believe that any parent who because of his own language deficiencies cannot find a decent job would actively deny his offspring the chance to gain that skill.

Hispanic children, just as any other children, are fertile beds ready to be implanted with the seeds of knowledge. However, no matter how eager they are to learn, they cannot be expected to absorb lessons from a teacher who speaks to them in an unintelligible language. It is no more rational to expect an English-speaking child to profit from classes in Spanish than it is to expect the Spanish-speaker to soak in mathematics and science courses taught in English. There must be some mechanism whereby that non-English speaker can be trained to understand English before being tossed into the mainstream of an English-based educational system.

Even though bilingual education efforts are underway in many schools around the country, I would suspect that there are many children who do not understand English—or who may understand rudimentary spoken English but who have no skills in reading or writing the language—who are sitting in classrooms all day listening to noises coming from the teacher. Hispanics are no dumber nor brighter than the rest of the population. But they do come from homes where English is not the spoken language. No matter how much the parents may want to, they cannot teach their children English, nor can they help them with their homework. The resolution of this problem lies with the school system, and it requires that measures be taken so that the child not be denied the education in subject matter areas enjoyed by his peers.

Who are the students who qualify for title VII assistance? In statutory terms, these students possess two characteristics.

First, they come from homes or communities where a language other than English is dominant or, in the case of American Indians and Alaskan native students, they come from environments where a language other than English has had a significant impact on their level of English language proficiency.

Second, because of the language background of these students, they must have sufficient difficulty speaking, reading, writing, or understanding the English language (so as to be denied) the opportunity to learn successfully in classrooms where the language of instruction is English.

In other words, the students assisted by title VII are language-minority students who are so limited in their English language proficiency that they cannot succeed in school unless they are given special instruction. In the case of Puerto Rico, title VII defines LEP students so as to include those students who return to Puerto Rico from the States without the Spanish skills they need to function effectively in school.

At the current time, there are more than 3.5 million LEP students in the United States. These students live in every State of the Union. Many LEP students attend schools in Puerto Rico. Approximately two-thirds of these students are Hispanic. A smaller but significant percentage of LEP students are of Asian ancestry or are descendants of America's first inhabitants. A large and growing number of LEP students have come to this country recently, often to escape armed conflict or the denial of fundamental political rights in their native lands. In all, limited-English-proficient students come from homes and communities where over 90 languages other than English are dominant.

Although local school districts and States are making an effort, schools in general are not meeting the need of limited English proficiency (LEP) children. Only about one-third of the 2.64 million children aged 5 to 14 identified in a 1978 study are receiving either bilingual education or English as a second language instruction, according to the Department of Education. This means 1.8 million LEP students currently go without any bilingual aid at all, and are left to sink or swim in an educational system based on a language they do not understand. Between now and the end of the century, the number of language-minority students will increase dramatically. According to a report prepared for the Department of Education, the total school age population is expected to increase by 16 percent between now and the year 2000. During this same period, the language-minority student population and the number of LEP students is expected to increase by approximately 40 percent.

The Nation continues to pay the price for its past educational neglect of language-minority students. Hispanics, for example, complete a median of 10.4 years of schooling, 2 years less schooling than that completed by the white, non-Hispanic population. Forty percent of the Hispanic population between the ages of 18 to 24 leaves high school without receiving a diploma compared with 14 percent of the white, non-Hispanic population.

The educational merit of bilingual education has already been documented at the State level. Recently, the New Jersey State Department of Education released a report based upon pre- and post-test scores of students enrolled in that State's bilingual program. The report concluded that "in all grades tested, results consistently showed that third-year bilingual students significantly outscored first and second year students in English language skills." More importantly, the study also demonstrated that bilingual students had made significant gains relative to English-speaking children in 8 of the 12 grades tested.

In 1982, the Michigan State Board of Education released results of a Statewide study of bilingual education. During the 1980–81 school year, 31,991 Michigan students were identified as having limited English-speaking ability. Of these, 19,528 students were in groups large enough to require bilingual education under State law. The Michigan study showed the achievement in both English reading and mathematics of students in bilingual education programs grew at a faster rate than the average rate for comparable students. According to the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Phillip E. Runkel, "almost one-third of the students—31.5 percent—improved so much that they became ineligible for the program at the end of the year."

In Puerto Rico, the bilingual education programs supported by title VII have proven to be successful in equipping English-speaking students with the language skills they need to succeed in our classrooms where instruction is generally provided in Spanish.

A student's right to intelligible instruction is a fundamental right that is protected by Federal law. In 1974, the Supreme Court ruled in Lau against Nichols that title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 requires school districts to provide some form of special instructional services to language-minority students who do not understand English. The logic of the landmark Lau decision was succinctly stated by the Court:

> Basic English skills are at the very core of what these public schools teach. Imposition of a requirement that, before a child can effectively participate in the educational program, he must already have acquired those basic skills is to make a mockery of public education. We know that those who do not understand English are certain to find their classroom experiences wholly incomprehensible and in no way meaningful.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORRADA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, recently, the Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary, and Vocational Education began hearings on the reauthorization of the bilingual education program. Those hearings were most informative, and I think proved that this issue goes beyond the concerns of those who are interested in the education of language minority children. It should concern everyone who is genuinely interested in the future of education and the future of our Nation.

The primary purpose of bilingual education is to teach a child English. Our language binds us together and opens opportunities for all Americans. A bilingual education program, however, does more than just teach a child to speak English. It allows a child to learn and become involved with his studies before he has completely mastered English—and before language barriers have frustrated and discouraged him. It helps counteract the problems of increasing school dropouts, alienation, and segregation which occur when children are put into a total immersion program. Bilingual education allows children to master and retain their native language as well as master English. They learn to be proud of their heritage and their culture.

America needs bilingual education. Our economic future lies not only in what we can accomplish as a nation, but how we take our trade, technology, and ideas to the rest of the world. Americans are notoriously deficient in foreign languages. Most American businessmen, diplomats, and members of the Foreign Service cannot converse in the language of the country where they are posted. We are fortunate that some Members of Congress have demonstrated a serious concern for this problem and have introduced excellent legislation to promote the study of foreign languages. Bilingual education programs can help these efforts. Bilingual education programs can provide a great service to our Nation by giving us a generation of children who are bilingual. They do this not only by teaching English to children who have limited English proficiency while preserving their native language, but by encouraging English speaking students to participate in bilingual classes. By letting children help each other and learn from each other, we not only encourage them to learn the language, but we break down cultural barriers and give them a special learning opportunity.

Some of my well-meaning colleagues are concerned with the teaching methods used in federally supported bilingual education programs, specifically that those programs require some degree of instruction in a childs native language. They point to programs which do not require native language instruction and applaud the fact that the children who participated have learned English. But I think that if they looked at the bilingual education program in the terms I have presented here, they would think a little differently. I also think that they overlook the fact that the bill does not prescribe a certain amount of native language instruction, but leaves that decision to the discretion of the school district. They forget that in a bilingual program, the child learns more than English. They learn that the preservation of their language and heritage is important—not only to themselves but to the well-being of our Nation. This Congress has a vested interest to encourage children to be fluent in a second language.

The bilingual education reauthorization bill is a responsible approach to the Federal financing of bilingual education programs and, I believe, should ease the concerns of those who have been critical of past bilingual education policy. It provides renewable, competitive grants to those school districts in need, and encourages the programs which have been most successful to continue their efforts and provide an example of excellence to others. The bill recognizes the fact that learning a language is a challenge for the entire family, and provides instructions for out-of-school family members. In addition, it strengthens administrative and data collection programs, and encourages instructors in bilingual programs to continue their own education. The bill has earned its title of "the Academic Equity and Excellence Through Bilingual Education Act of 1984." I am proud to be a cosponsor of this legislation and I strongly urge my colleagues to lend their support to the efforts to pass this bill.

Mr. CORRADA. I commend the gentleman certainly for that statement. Let me say that as a member of the Education and Labor Committee he has been contributing significantly to pursuing a course of action that will result in the reauthorization of the bilingual education program on a basis that will signify improving the educational opportunities of children with limited English proficiency.

Mr. ORTIZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORRADA. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ORTIZ. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I do support the legislaion on bilingual education.

Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise to offer my strong support for H.R. 5231, the Academic Equity and Excellence Through a Bilingual Education Act of 1984. I am proud to be included as an original cosponsor of this most important legislation.

H.R. 5231 addresses the themes of excellence and equity so central to many of the recent national reports on the condition of American education. Improving the quality of education available to the Nation's 3.6 million children of limited English proficiency is especially important because they have been found to be one of the most undereducated of all groups of American children.

Bilingual education is misunderstood by many Americans and, consequently, not appreciated for the contribution it makes to both those of limited English proficiency and to our society as a whole.

A successful bilingual education program produces children who can function fluently and interchangeably in two languages. Studies by education experts have shown that bilingual education promotes linguistic and cultural continuity between the home and the school. This means that children see a correlation between what they learn at home and in the classroom, rather than becoming confused by two completely different languages and learning environments.

Bilingual programs also draw parents into the education process, which is extremely important for the child's overall positive education experience. Once in school, bilingual programs help the child to stay there. Prior to 1968, when bilingual education programs were begun, the dropout rate among non-English speaking students was spectacularly high. In some ethnic groups, fewer than 20 percent of the students completed high school. Since 1968, however, participants in bilingual education programs are four times as likely to finish high school and the number entering college has increased. Because proficiency in written and spoken English is essential in most positions, we must insure that those with limited English skills are prepared for meaningful employment once they leave school.

H.R. 5231 clearly offers the best approach for teaching the English language without academic deceleration, with the minimum development of negative concepts of self, and with the maximum development of the intellectual potential of the child.

H.R. 5231 authorizes the allocation of much needed additional funds for bilingual programs, teacher training and retraining, research, and evaluation commensurate with the growth of the population of children who require bilingual education.

Of even greater importance, this bill significantly increases the amount of available data on children of limited English proficiency and provides for additional information regarding the characteristics and outcomes of the bilingual programs designed to serve them through an increased emphasis on data collection, evaluation, and monitoring.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5231 is essential if we are to continue providing an opportunity for children of limited English proficiency an equal chance for succeeding in, and contributing to, this great Nation. I urge my colleagues to join with me in strong and active support of this vital legislation.

Mr. CORRADA. I really appreciate very much the gentleman's remarks. I know that he is very much interested in seeing that Hispanic, as well as other language minority children, are able to receive equal educational opportunity, which is all that we want them to have. We want them to be able to become proficient in English as soon as possible. A transitional bilingual education program is nothing else but a way of utilizing the native language only while that child is able to develop that proficiency in English. And we believe it is the best approach because if you, for instance, insist that there can be no use whatsoever of the child's native language while he becomes proficient in English, in the end by having that kind of sink or swim approach, what we are doing is getting many of those children out of the school system. They drop out. They are not able to understand. They lag behind. They have a sense of a poor image because they are not able to keep up with their peers and ultimately they end up becoming school dropouts.

Through the bilingual education process, we are able to retain them in the educational system, use some native language only to the extent that is necessary to keep the child there while he becomes proficient in English. Naturally as soon as that English proficiency is attained then the child is able to continue his or her education in the mainstream of the normal classroom, which is an English-speaking classroom.

Mr. ORTIZ. If the gentleman will yield further, what I could say about my district is that I have been able to observe the parents of these children who are very limited as far as the proficiency in English language. I have been able to see the parents get involved more because they know that the teacher knows something about their background, knows something about the customs. I believe that once the parents become familiar with what is being taught in bilinqual schools, then they begin to become more interested in the education.

Mr. CORRADA. Let me point out to the gentleman, some people think that we Hispanics want to force upon English-speaking people in our country Spanish or any other foreign language. We do not want to do that. We understand that English is the language of this country, what people speak in business, in school, in the social environment, and so on.

What we want is our children to have the opportunity of learning English in a way that is done so that the children do not turn away from the classroom.

Furthermore, of course, we are very proud of our Hispanic heritage, of our culture, but within a concept of cultural pluralism that exists and enriches the life of this Nation.

There is no divisiveness or sense of separation by Hispanics, for instance, when we speak Spanish in our homes, or in the subway or anywhere else. I think that what would keep Hispanics separated or any other language minority is to deny them equal education opportunities by keeping them away from the educational system by not providing something like bilingual education. Just as I believe that not bringing Hispanics into the electoral process, into the political process, by having such provisions as the Voting Rights Act, which provides that material will be furnished both in English, as well as any other language, where 5 percent or more of the population belongs to a language minority.

Well, if these people by better understanding in their own language what democracy is all about, what the political process is all about, go and register to vote, participate in the political process, we are bringing them into the mainstream of American politics, rather then keeping them away.

Mr. Speaker, the right of language-minority students to special instructional services is also protected by the Equal Educational Opportunities Act of 1974. Section 204(f) of this Federal statute makes it illegal for an educational agency to fail to "take appropriate action to overcome language barriers that impede equal participation by its students in its instructional program."

The Bilingual Education Act is the only Federal mechanism in place today to assist State and local education agencies in the capacity-building activities they must undertake to fulfill their obligations under these Federal civil rights statutes. Contrary to what I have heard from many so-called experts, I believe that expenditures for bilingual education programs will help to decrease future budget deficits. In fiscal terms, it is self-defeating to reduce expenditures for vital and effective education programs such as title VII. Language-minority students need bilingual education programs to succeed in school and to become economically productive members of our society.

Without a specific bilingual education program to address their needs, countless language-minority students would drop out of school. Most of the language-minority students who continue in school would graduate without the skills they need for survival in our increasingly competitive economy. This, in turn, would deprive the Federal Government of future tax revenues and, at the same time, increase future Federal outlays for public assistance and unemployment compensation.

Bilingual education is an effective method for inculcating the English language skills language-minority students need for academic success. Furthermore, it addresses the educational needs of a growing population whose labor market difficulties are more severe than those of other groups. The roots of disproportionate employment figures are not clear cut, but a recent study by the National Commission for Employment Policy stated that "a lack of fluency in English is the major source of the labor market difficulties" faced by Hispanics. For this reason, bilingual education takes on central importance for the economic future of our people.

I would also note that bilingual education can be used to serve the Nation's international interests. Although the primary purpose of title VII is to insure that language-minority students receive equal educational opportunities, bilingual education programs also preserve and expand our Nation's inadequate linguistic resources. This year, the House of Representatives passed legislation to promote national security and economic growth through foreign language improvement. During the hearings on this bill, military leaders, intelligence officials, and corporation directors testified that America's shortage of bilingual personnel jeopardized the successful conduct of foreign affairs and international trade. The Department of Defense, for example, presented statistics which showed that in 1980 it was able to fill only 58 percent of the DOD positions which required fluency in Spanish. Bilingual education can be a useful tool in correcting our current linguistic deficiencies, and improving the Nation's capabilities in maintaining a strong defense, effective diplomacy, and meaningful international trade.

Mr. Speaker, this year the Congress must reauthorize the Bilingual Education Act. As a member of the Elementary, Secondary and Vocational Education Subcommittee of the Education and Labor Committee, I have joined 50 of my colleagues in introducing H.R. 5231, the Academic Equity and Excellence Through Bilingual Education Act of 1984. I am very pleased with the improvements this bill represents, as could be ascertained from the testimony we heard during hearings last week. This bill represents a consensus between groups representing the language minority populations, such as the National Association for Bilingual Education, the National Council of La Raza, the League of United Latin American Citizens, the Mexican-American Legal Defense & Education Fund, the Joint National Commission on Languages, the National Association for Asian Pacific American Education, and the National Congress of American Indians.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I will insert a brief summary of the provisions of H.R. 5231:

SUMMARY OF MAJOR FEATURES: DRAFT BILINGUAL EDUCATION REAUTHORIZATION BILL

Authorization Level: For the purposes of carrying out the provisions of the act, there are authorized to be appropriated $400,000,000 for fiscal year 1985; $450,000,000 for fiscal year 1986; $500,000,000 for fiscal year 1987, and such sums as may be necessary for each of the four succeeding fiscal years. Additionally, there is a separate authorization for grants to State Education Agencies (SEAs) under this title. For SEA grants $24,000,000 is authorized for fiscal year 1985; $28,000,000 for fiscal year 1986; $32,000,000 for fiscal year 1987, and such sums as may be necessary for each of the four succeeding fiscal years. The 1985 authorizations are the same as the 1983 authorization figures for this program prior to the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act.

Length of Authorization: This legislation reauthorizes Title VII, the Bilingual Education Act, from fiscal year 1985 through fiscal year 1991.

PART A: FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR BILINGUAL EDUCATION PROGRAMS

Sixty percent of the funds available under this act are reserved for programs funded under this part. The legislation would authorize bilingual program grants in the following categories:

Transitional Bilingual Education Programs. These programs are designed to serve limited English proficient (LEP) children, although up to 40% of the children in the program may be non-LEP for integration purposes. The programs require a structured English-language component, and to the extent necessary, instruction in the child's native language. Programs must be designed so that children can meet promotion and graduation requirements. Grants are for three years, and are renewable for an additional two years. The first six months of the grant is to be used for training, planning and other pre-service activities (a waiver may be provided for districts where such activities are not necessary).

Language Development Programs. These programs are designed to allow all participating children to achieve competence in English and a second language, and meet promotion and graduation requirements. The programs are to be composed of approximately equal number of LEP and non-LEP children (although a waiver may be granted where this is not feasible). Grants are for three years, and are renewable for an additional two years. As in the case of transitional bilingual education grants, the first six months of the grant is for pre-service activities.

Academic Excellence Programs. Programs funded under this category are programs of bilingual education which have established a record of providing effective, academically excellent instruction. These grants are for three years, and are for the purpose of identifying, strengthening and utilizing existing excellent programs of bilingual instruction.

Family English Literacy Programs. These programs are designed for the parents and out-of-school family members of LEP children in recognition of the fact that language learning is a family process. The programs are designed to help the family acquire competence in the English language, and provide instruction on how parents may facilitate the educational achievement of LEP children. Instruction in these programs may be conducted bilingually, or since the main objective is English literacy for adults, may be conducted entirely in English. Grants are for three years.

Bilingual Preschool Programs. This program, currently authorized under Title VII, provides support for bilingual preschool programs.

Materials Development Projects. These grants provide assistance for the development of teaching materials in languages where commercially-produced materials are not available.

Indian Children in Schools. Provisions are the same as in the 1978 Act.

Students in Puerto Rico. Provisions are the same as in the 1978 Act.

PART B: DATA COLLECTION, EVALUATION, AND RESEARCH

Funds under this part are for (a) collecting data on the number of LEP persons and the educational services available to such persons, (b) evaluating the operation and effectiveness of Title VII bilingual education programs, and (c) conducting research to improve the effectiveness of bilingual education programs. Specific programs and activities include:

State Education Agency Programs. These grants provide funds to State Education Agencies (SEAs) to collect, aggregate, analyze and publish data and information on the state's LEP population, and the educational services available to such persons. States will provide annual reports of this information to the Secretary of Education. State programs may also include: planning and development of bilingual programs; review and evaluation of bilingual programs; provision or coordination of technical assistance; development and administration of instruments to assess the educational needs and competencies of LEP persons; and the training of SEA and LEA staff. Grants shall not be less than $50,000 nor greater than five percent of the Title VII monies received by the state in the preceding year.

Promulgation of Evaluation Regulations. The Secretary shall issue regulations setting forth a comprehensive evaluation design for programs assisted under Part A. These regulations shall provide for the collection of information and data including information on: educational background, needs and competencies of LEP program students; specific educational activities which are part of the program; qualifications and competencies of program staff; and the extent of educational progress achieved by the program as determined by various suggested criteria.

Evaluation Assistance Centers. These centers, at least two of which shall be established, will provide technical assistance on evaluation and assessment of SEAs and LEAs. Grants are for three years.

Research Activities. Funding is provided for research and development proposals submitted by institutions of higher education, private and non-profit organizations, SEAs, LEAs, and individuals in a variety of specified areas. Grants are to be competitive, and requests for proposals announced by the Secretary. The legislation also includes the provisions currently in the act regarding the operation of a clearinghouse of information on bilingual education.

PART C: TRAINING AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Twenty-five percent of the funds available under the Act are reserved for activities authorized under this part—an increase from the percentage currently earmarked for training. Funds under this part are to be used for training and re-training of instructional personnel, advanced study in bilingual education, assistance to schools of education, and the provision of technical assistance to school districts implementing bilingual education programs. Authorized activities include:

Pre-Service Training Programs. This program authorizes the establishment and support of training programs for educational personnel preparing to participate in programs of bilingual education. The legislation gives preference to programs containing specified minimal components of a bilingual teacher training program.

Training Institutes. Short-term training institutes are designed to improve the skills of participants in bilingual programs. These institutes may provide training to parents, and also may include summer language programs designed to improve the institutional competency of educational personnel working in bilingual programs. The institutes are designed to help districts address their need for re-training teachers and improving teacher competencies in bilingual education.

Fellowship Program for Advanced Study in Bilingual Education. The fellowship program provides assistance to students pursuing advanced studies in bilingual education in such fields as: bilingual teacher training, curriculum development, program administration, and research and evaluation. The number of fellowships named in the legislation is a slight increase over those currently awarded.

Dean's Grant Program. The "Dean's Grant" program encourages reform, innovation and improvement in applicable education curricula in graduate education, in the structure of the academic profession, and in the recruitment and retention of higher education and graduate school faculties as related to bilingual education.

Multifunctional Resource Centers. At least 16 "Multifunctional Resource Centers" are established to provide, upon request, training and technical assistance to educational personnel and parents participating in bilingual education programs. The Centers provide comprehensive technical assistance to programs located within their geographic service area. In addition, each Center is responsible for gathering and providing information to other Centers on a particular area of bilingual education, including: bilingual special education, bilingual adult education, bilingual program administration, education technology, literacy, math and science education in bilingual programs, counseling limited English proficient students, and career education programs for limited English proficient students.

PART D: ADMINISTRATION

As in the current act, the proposed legislation mandates an Office of Bilingual Education and Minority Languages Affairs (OBEMLA), to be headed by a Director to whom the Secretary will delegate all of his delegable functions regarding bilingual education. The legislation modifies the existing National Advisory Council on Bilingual Education and creates a National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education. The legislation makes the following changes in the administrative provisions:

The creation of a division within OBEMLA exclusively responsible for the collection, aggregation, analysis and publication of data and information on the operation and effectiveness of programs assisted by Title VII is mandated.

The National Advisory and Coordinating Council has an expanded role in this legislation, serving as the mechanism through which the Director consults with affected groups and constituencies and participating in the formulation of reports, regulations and research agendas and policies. The composition of the Council is also altered to strengthen its function of coordinating federal policy with state and local bilingual policies. All members must be knowledgeable about bilingual education and the needs of LEP individuals. Five members shall be state bilingual education directors; five local school board members or bilingual program directors; three experienced in research and evaluation; two bilingual classroom teachers; two bilingual teacher trainers; two parents; and one representative of a professional association representing bilingual education personnel.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleagues for joining me today in this special order. I believe that before many weeks have passed, this bill will be scheduled for consideration by the House, and at that time I will urge my colleagues to vote to protect the rights of each child to an appropriate, intelligible education and to afford these children the opportunity of becoming English proficient and the opportunity of gaining the necessary skills so that tomorrow they will be able to be gainfully employed.

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, I want to take this opportunity to express my support for the Academic Equity and Excellence Through Bilingual Education Act of 1984.

To comprehend bilingual education's political popularity among language-minority Americans, one has only to recall the educational conditions which prompted Congress to enact the Bilingual Education Act 16 years ago.

In 1968, most schools were unable—and some were unwilling—to provide effective education to language-minority children. Predictably, millions of these students left school early; others graduated from school lacking the skills needed for employment or post-secondary education.

While the Bilingual Education Act has helped to improve the academic opportunities available to language-minority students, it has not eliminated the problems of discrimination and neglect. And how could it be expected to when, even today, fewer than 1 of every 10 limited-English-proficient (LEP) students are enrolled in a bilingual education program.

Data from all parts of the country document the effectiveness of the bilingual education programs supported by the Bilingual Education Act. In New York City, for example, title VII grants have helped to develop bilingual education programs in many of the city's public schools which enroll large numbers of LEP students. The programs have served students from a wide variety of language backgrounds including: Arabic, Chinese, French, Haitian-Creole, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, Korean, Russian, Spanish, and Yiddish.

At the current time, there are more than 85,000 students enrolled in the bilingual education programs of the New York City public schools. Like other public school programs, New York City bilingual education programs are underfunded and understaffed. They have, however, measurably improved the education of language-minority students.

School attendance is a simple measure of educational success. We all know that school dropouts have little opportunity to learn, and even less opportunity to earn. They are less apt to play productive roles and are more apt to engage in socially destructive behavior than their peers who remain in school.

According to the simple and reliable measure of school attendance, bilingual education has proven extremely effective in New York City schools. While the citywide average rate of school attendance is approximately 75 percent, the rate of student attendance in bilingual education programs exceeds 90 percent.

New York City students enrolled in bilingual education programs not only have better attendance records, but they also have higher graduation rates. In this regard, New York City's experience is representative of the Nation's experience.

Three years ago, the National Opinion Research Center conducted a study of high school sophomores and seniors. That study showed that bilingual education programs cut in half the difference in school dropout rates experienced by Hispanic versus non-Hispanic students.

In New York, we have also found that bilingual education programs improve college admission rates. Two years ago at the Louis D. Brandeis High School on the Upper West Side, 85 percent of the graduates who had been enrolled in the bilingual education program were admitted to institutions of higher education. Only 75 percent of the school's graduates who had not received bilingual instruction were admitted to institutions of higher education. The graduates of the Brandeis bilingual program are attending some of the Nation's most prestigious colleges and universities including Princeton, Barnard, Cornell, Sarah Lawrence, Brandeis, Vassar, and M.I.T.

In America today, there are millions of language-minority citizens who have not been assimilated into the economic, social, and political life of this Nation. These citizens tend to live in communities where economic forces and discriminatory "customs" maintain rigid ethnic segregation. Many of these citizens have been victimized by employment discrimination; many are unemployed; and many more are underemployed and underpaid. We owe the millions of language-minority citizens the opportunity to share the benefits of our society by making education accessible through bilingual education.●

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my dear friend and colleague Robert Garcia, chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus for requesting this special order. Those of us participating in this special order are coming before our colleagues to call their attention to the bilingual education reauthorization bill. This reauthorization bill was introduced last week by the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. KILDEE, the members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, and 48 of our other colleagues.

The Bilingual Education Act was designed as a tool which could be used to teach English to children of limited English proficiency. In the Hispanic community, it is to improve the educational opportunities available to language-minority children. More and more educators, familiar with teaching such children, believe that for many Hispanic children bilingual education is the most effective and efficient method which can remove educational barriers and provide Hispanic children with access to the mainstream of American life.

At the national level, title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act provides Federal funding for bilingual programs, teacher training, and research. Federal support constitutes only 18 percent of the total educational resources earmarked for bilingual education programs. The importance of the Kildee Bilingual Education Act reauthorization bill rests largely on the fact that the Federal role, though small, has been critical in stimulating creative responses to the particular needs of language-minority students.

It is well known that the number of Hispanic Americans has grown significantly over the last decade. The number of limited English-proficient children also have increased because of the growing numbers of refugee and immigrant children in need of special educational services. Yesterday morning, the Washington Post featured articles on the particular impact of this situation in the northern Virginia area.

The Kildee bill is an improved version of the current law. It incorporates provisions which strengthen structured English language training. There is an emphasis on increasing the number of highly qualified bilingual instructional personnel. There are provisions to insure that understandable instruction in subject matter areas continues to be made available to these children. There is a commitment to make these children fully competent and fluent in English.

During the balance of this decade, as we begin to move toward all Americans becoming fluent in English, we should recognize that we need to offer special help to children with limited English proficiency.●

● Mr. SUNIA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill to reauthorize the Bilingual Education Act which expires this year.

That program has been very successful in assisting my territory because it promotes excellence through grants for developmental bilingual education, academic excellence programs, and family English literacy programs.

It is important to keep in mind that while the overwhelming majority of students enrolled in the public schools of American Samoa speak Samoan as their first and dominant language, many of them will need the skills of the English language. As they proceed to higher education and employment opportunities in the mainland, they will not survive without a bilingual capability.

A limited number of native English speakers also participate. Their participation is also quite essential insofar as the great majority of them are children of stateside contract employees "employed by the American Samoa Government". These children will return to the United States at the expiration of their parents' 2-year contracts with the Government. thus, it is important that their native English language skills are maintained and improved.

In another key area of this bill, the shortage of well-trained bilingual teachers in American Samoa is addressed through an expanded and more tightly directed training component that targets funding on programs with specified minimal training components.

It must be remembered that only very recently English was the official language of instruction in the public schools in American Samoa; Samoan was used only when communication in English broke down. The impact of the Bilingual Education Act has been to restore the Samoan language to the classrooms with the dignity and standing it deserves.

Everywhere in Samoa, cognitive growth has been fostered and reinforced in two languages. Crossovers are encouraged and the program is one common curriculum in two languages, rather than separate curricula. The positive effect that this reauthorization would have for the territory of American Samoa has not been underestimated. I urge your support for the reauthorization of the Bilingual Education Act. Without it, our cross-cultural environment will suffer a setback in developing our most important resource; our children.●

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, it has become fairly commonplace in this country to disregard the inscription at the feet of one of America's truly great women—the Statute of Liberty. Too many of us are no longer interested in the tired, the poor and the hungry masses of the world and nowhere is our newfound hostility and inhospitality more evident than in the surging tide against bilingual education. Systematically, the Reagan administration has reduced and still seeks to slash funds for title VII, the bilingual education program that has served this country for 15 years.

It would be a tragic loss. For 15 years, bilingual education has served to make this strange and hostile land a little less strange and hostile to millions of limited English-speaking children. Statistics have shown that children attending bilingual classes have attended school longer and more regularly than in the past. Discipline problems for those children have fallen off and fewer of them are being mistakenly placed in special education classes for the handicapped. In short, there are a lot of walking success stories out there. Why must we put a stop to them?●

● Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, the Academic Equity and Excellence Through Bilingual Education Act of 1984 provides the necessary resources to insure that there are enough well-trained bilingual teachers to go around, and that these important bilingual programs—and the students they serve—are not sacrificed in an era of budget cuts. The bill provides funding not only for the preservation of existing programs, but also for the training and retraining of teachers, and for research and evaluation of teaching methods. In short, the measure helps insure that we not only continue to serve immigrant children, but also that we improve the education that these children receive. And for a population that has been documented as one of the most undereducated of all groups of American children, this commitment is extremely important.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill. We cannot hope to become in practice a nation in which all can make the most of their native abilities if these native abilities have been stifled or sacrificed by xenophobic teaching methods.●

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today with the introduction of the Bilingual Education Act extension, we are recognizing the needs of the Nation's 3.6 million children with limited English proficiency.

As a cosponsor of the reauthorization, I hope that we will continue to recognize the need for bilingual education. Too often we think of bilingual programs in limited terms. Our Nation continues to attract those from a wide variety of backgrounds who need assistance in learning English. This bill authorizes additional funds for bilingual programs, teacher training and retraining, research, and evaluation. The legislation also safeguards the current local determination of bilingual program design.

There are many reasons why the continuation of bilingual programs is necessary. Bilingual education is an investment in our Nation's future. The children with limited English proficiency have been found to be one of the most undereducated groups of all American children. Economically, it is to our advantage to assist these children as early as possible in their education.

Bilingual education will assist children of limited English proficiency in taking an active part in our Nation's society. It will mean that their children also will be proficient in English and part of mainstream America.

We need to increase the amount of data on these children so we can better assist bilingual programs in the future. This bill would provide for the collection of data and would provide additional information about the characteristics and outcomes of the bilingual programs designed to serve children.

I hope that Congress will reaffirm the goals it established in the Bilingual Education Act by acting quickly on the reauthorization of the act.●

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, today, I add my voice to this special order on bilingual education. I am among the 53 Members who are cosponsoring H.R. 5231, the Bilingual Education Amendments of 1984. This legislation reauthorizes title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) and represents a major step forward in promoting equality of educational opportunity for all Americans.

I want to acknowledge the effective leadership on this issue that has been demonstrated by our colleague from Michigan (Mr. KILDEE) and our colleague from Puerto Rico (Mr. CORRADA).

As we debate bilingual education, we should be careful not to lose sight of the original purpose of the bilingual education programs of the Federal Government: To promote equality of educational opportunity. For hundreds of thousands of American schoolchildren, equality of opportunity in education means bilingual education.

Bilingual programs benefit limited English proficiency students in many ways. Through competitive grants, State and local education agencies are able to expand their capacity to meet the educational requirements of these students. Demonstration grants are provided to support exemplary programs in bilingual education; desegregation grants go to support local voluntary efforts in this area; training is provided for improving the quality of teaching in bilingual education; and a variety of support services, such as research and materials development projects, are supported by the act.

Because of my longstanding interest in the area of foreign language studies in the United States, I am pleased that the bilingual legislation that has been introduced contains a provision for developmental bilingual education programs. This calls for access into bilingual programs for students whose mother tongue is English. The goal of this approach is to allow all participating children to achieve competence in English and a second language, and to progress through the school system. These programs are to be composed of approximately equal numbers of students of both language bases. The present law is that 40 percent of the young people in a bilingual class can be students whose mother tongue is English. The new proposal increases that.

The reality that this recognizes is that to operate effectively in this country a person must have the command of the English language and must have an education. But the second reality is that to operate effectively in the year 1984 and beyond many of us are going to have to acquire skills in languages other than English.

This new language development emphasis is a step in the right direction. It permits monolingual Americans to become bilingual, and in so doing enable more Americans to achieve competence in more than one language—something essential for the United States as it tries to compete in a world in which our inability to speak the languages of other countries often excludes us from profitable markets and prevents us from understanding and dealing effectively with events and problems abroad before they become world crises.

The Commission on Excellence in Education called for greater proficiency in foreign languages, noting that—of study and should, therefore, be started in the elementary grades. We believe it is desirable that students achieve such proficiency because study of a foreign language introduces students to non-English-speaking cultures, heightens awareness and comprehension of one's native tongue, and serves the Nation's needs in commerce, diplomacy, defense, and education.

The bilingual education program offers an opportunity to help carry out the recommendation of the Commission. Through the language development programs, we can introduce thousands of students to a second-language, and provide support for their ongoing study, leading toward proficiency in a second language.

I strongly support the bill and bilingual education. America has within its borders the fourth-largest Spanish-speaking population in the world. Some 15 million Americans are of Hispanic origin—some 6.4 percent of the total American population. This group is the fastest-growing segment of our population. We should make sure that bilingual education exists for the estimated 3.5 million elementary and secondary school students who are limited English proficiency students, 80 percent of whom are of Hispanic Origin.

The administration has proposed drastic cuts in bilingual education. These proposals are shortsighted and wrong. We should make sure that bilingual education is able to provide that all-important educational bridge toward greater proficiency in English. If the bilingual program can also be expanded to include more second-language acquisition for English speakers, then the program will serve an even greater educational need in this country.●

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the reauthorization of bilingual education.

¿Como se sentiria si fuera ustéd un joven en este pais quien queria aprender, pero aún no podia comunicarse bien en inglés?

How would you feel if you were a youngster in this country who wanted to learn, but you could not yet communicate well in English? You would probably feel pretty frustrated.

Over 3.6 million children in this Nation are limited in their English proficiency. This covers a range of youngsters whose native language is one other than English to individuals who are American Indians or Alaskan natives or in an environment where a language other than English has a significant impact on the level of English proficiency.

According to data from the Department of Education, two-thirds of limited English proficient children receive no special language assistance—nothing. Therefore, it should not come as a surprise that these children have a high dropout rate and that their educational attainment rate continues to plunge.

When considering the recent national reports on the condition of American education, consider this: Limited English proficient children have been found to be one of the most undereducated of all groups of American children. I urge you to give serious thought about what the real issue is before us. This goes beyond any debate regarding the extent to which we want to become a bilingual society—the issue is whether or not we, as leaders in this country, are going to take the responsible action of seeing to it that all of our children are given a chance to be educated.

The reauthorization of bilingual legislation would significantly increase the amount of data on limited English proficient children, and provide additional information about the programs and about the outcomes of the same. Research and evaluation in this field needs to be strengthened to better identify and promote those programs and instructional practices which result in effective education.

How can we expect these 3.6 million children of limited English proficiency to assimilate into our culture here in the United States, if they cannot communicate properly?

Today's children are tomorrow's adults. If the opportunity for improvement through education is withdrawn, what can we expect of these future adults?

What chance will they have to participate normally in our society if they are handicapped by their lack of competence in English.

Let us give these 3.6 million children a chance—this is an issue that affects us all.●

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues in support of the bill to reauthorize the Bilingual Education Act which expires this year. As author of the original Bilingual Education Act, I strongly believe that this bill goes a long way in developing the seminal ideas of the original act. One if its major objectives is to make the current program cost effective. To this end, improvements in data collection, evaluation, and research are required. The National Center for Education Statistics is to collect and publish data on the number of limited-English persons in the United States and its territories the special programs available for the education of such persons, and the number of persons enrolled in these programs. States will be able to receive grants for the same purpose and local educational agencies that receive grants must submit an application that contains specific information on the number of children enrolled in the program, the extent of their educational needs, the activities undertaken to improve the educational attainment of the students and how these goals will be measured. The bill requires the Secretary to issue regulations which set forth a comprehensive design for evaluating the programs assisted under this title. At least two evaluation assistance centers will be established to provide technical assistance to the State and local educational agencies regarding methods and techniques for identifying the educational needs of the limited-English proficient persons and assessing the educational progress achieved through programs assisted under this title. States may also receive assistance to review and evaluate programs of bilingual education. Local education agencies must include a description of program goals and how achievement of these goals will be measured. There is a great deal of successful instruction going on right now that many educators just do not know about because of poor dissemination and technical assistance. This bill establishes multifactional resource centers whose role it is to help build the capacity of local districts to network with each other so that effective practices are shared. Programs that have an established record of providing effective, academically excellent instruction can receive grants to disseminate these effective practices. Several innovative ideas are contained in the proposed legislation. Language development programs, composed of equal numbers of limited-English proficient and English-speaking students, will allow all children to achieve competence in English and a second language. Adult English literary programs will help parents and out-of-school family members of limited English-proficient children acquire competence in the English language and training on how to encourage the educational achievement of their children.

Limited English proficiency has precluded many children from progressing in school and competing economically in an English-speaking society. Bilingual education enables these large and growing numbers of children to acquire English rapidly so that they can take advantage of the educational program offered in English-speaking schools. Just enough of their own language is used to help these children understand the instructional task at hand so that they do not become discouraged and tune out or dropout. Teachers who speak their language can understand their educational, social, and emotional needs and are thus able to encourage them as they make the difficult adjustment to a new language and culture. Instruction in their own language helps these children build and maintain basic skills so that they do not fall behind while they are acquiring English. Until they are fluent in English, it provides them with an opportunity for social development and creative expression, both of which are impossible without language fluency. Recognizing that the proposed legislation will improve the educational progress of limited English-proficient children in our country, I fully support this legislation and urge you to do the same.●

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to join with my colleagues today who are discussing the Bilingual Education Act of 1984. There is no question that much needs to be done to help the large numbers of students who are growing up in non-English speaking homes. We as a society owe it to ourselves to educate these children and help them make the transition into an English speaking world. There are numerous programs through which we can help these children make the transition.

Why then, you might ask, do we stress bilingual education rather than other programs to help the non-English-speaking child. I raise this question, not to debate educational philosophies, but rather to raise the subject of what is in the best long run interest of the United States.

The prosperity of the United States depends on the ability to compete in the world market for goods and services and on the prosperity of its trading partners. Even though English is rapidly becoming the accepted language of international commerce and diplomacy, the United States is handicapped if it fails to understand the language, culture, and history of other societies. What, you ask, does this have to do with bilingual education? Language ability and the understanding of different cultures has everything to do with our ability to compete in the world economy and influence world events.

At the root of bilingual education is the philosophy that children are more easily taught in the language with which they are most comfortable. In many cases this will require the schools to first reinforce the child's ability in a foreign language while simultaneously teaching English. In addition to teaching in a foreign language, the bilingual method effectively increases the familiarity and respect a child has for a foreign culture. One aspect often ignored in discussions of bilingual education is the fact that many English speaking children learn foreign languages through the same bilingual education instruction which helps the non-English speaking child make the transition to English.

If the United States is to retain its role as a world political power and regain its position in world trade, we will need people who are conversant in many foreign languages and cultures. Our Nation is blessed with immigrants from many countries. While we must help the immigrants and non-English speaking native born make the transition to English, we should also think of those people as a language resource. Our ability to export our goods and know-how only partially depends on having the better product. We must also know how to sell the goods in foreign markets.

As one who grew up in a bilingual environment, the Lower Rio Grande Valley of Texas, I can attest to the value of speaking more than one language. Since being elected to Congress I have had the opportunity to meet with many foreign officials on my own visits overseas and right here in Washington. My fluency in just one romance language, Spanish, has opened many doors that might otherwise have remained closed and helped me gain a greater understanding of foreign interests. In addition, having grown up speaking two languages I have found it easier to learn additional languages. This has opened even more doors.

My duties as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture have only reinforced my belief that our Nation suffers from monolingualism. It is much easier to sell agricultural products to our trading partners if we can speak to them in their own language rather than depending on them to speak English.

We need more, not fewer people who are fluent in Chinese, Arabic, Spanish, Vietnamese, and all the other languages of the world. We need bilingual engineers, doctors, computer programers, scientists, salesmen, and corporate managers who can help sell American goods and services throughout the world. Bilingual education should not be considered a threat to our American way of life but rather an investment in our human resources. Due to the miracle of modern communications and travel we do not have the luxury of remaining monolingual.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my strong support for the reauthorization of the Bilingual Education Act and commend Mr. KILDEE and Mr. CORRADA for their efforts in carefully assembling this critical legislation. This bill provides important measures toward eradicating discrimination in education in our American schools. Inequality in education cannot be tolerated for our Nation's national security, economic strength and quality of life is dependent upon the literacy of all its citizens.

The Bilingual Education Act addresses the need for improving the quality and equality of education for the 3.6 million children in the United States of limited English proficiency. We cannot overcome traditional low educational achievements and high dropout rates of language minority students unless we build on the proficiency skills these children bring to the classroom. The bilingual education program provides the opportunity for these children to assimilate, participate, and contribute to our society through enhancement of their linguistic and conceptual competency of the English language.

In my State of California alone, bilingual education programs serve 88,689 students of limited English proficiency. As the number of these students increases daily, it becomes evident that we are losing the full depth of our Nation's potential by failing to utilize their talents and capabilities. It is imperative that we educate and cultivate this untapped resource. Our investment in bilingual education today can only reap benefits for our communities, our States and our Nation as a whole tomorrow.●

● Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to participate in today's special order on bilingual education. After introducing my own bill on bilingual ed, H.R. 5099, I am encouraged by today's hearing in the House Education and Labor Committee on an omnibus reauthorization bill, H.R. 5231. The time to demonstrate our continuing commitment to bilingual education is here. I am pleased to join the gentleman from Michigan as an original cosponsor of H.R. 5231 and I am hopeful that we will see this bill enacted during this session.

Bilingual education faces some difficult policy questions as we move toward reauthorization. Historically, language-minority students in the United States have received unequal and inferior educational opportunities. The current debate centers around whether native language instruction should be retained in federally funded programs.

Many opponents of native language instruction have argued that other programs like title I and Public Law 94-142, the Handicapped Education Act, do not prescribe a method of teaching. Standards do exist, however, for these programs. Title I must be used in schools with low-income and disadvantaged children. Public Law 94-142 programs mandate parental involvement and mainstreaming of handicapped children into regular classrooms. As a Federal program, title VII, the bilingual education title of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, must also have standards. We must remember that title VII is neither a mandated or an entitlement program. Consequently, the Federal Government is well within its right to establish native language instruction as the cornerstone of its bilingual education program. Both the Carnegie Corp. and a Columbia Teachers College study found that this teaching method has been supported because it is effective.

Civil rights and equal educational opportunity is the one area where the Federal Government has played a traditional role in protecting the interests of the disadvantaged. History has shown, unfortunately, that limited-English proficiency children need the protection of the Federal Government. In my own congressional district, bilingual education programs exist in Haitian, Creole, Italian, Indochinese languages as well as Spanish. The children in these programs deserve every opportunity for a quality education. I expect to be fully involved with the reauthorization of the Bilingual Education Act in the coming months. I am hopeful that components of my bill, H.R. 5099, can be adopted as part of the larger omnibus package. I look forward to working with the gentleman from Michigan and members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus as this bill moves through the House.●

● Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, on March 22, with the cosponsorship of 50 of my colleagues in this House, I introduced H.R. 5231, a bill to reauthorize title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965—also known as the Bilingual Education Act. This bill recognizes the importance of Federal bilingual education programs to the schoolchildren of this Nation. It insures that the current Federal effort in this area continues and develops. Limited-English-proficient children are a Federal constituency in the same way handicapped children, disadvantaged children, and other special-needs groups of children are. The Federal Government, since the original enactment of the Bilingual Education Act in 1968, has sought to lead the way in providing services for these children. The Federal effort so far, however, has only been a beginning. Less than 10 percent of limited-English-proficient children are receiving the bilingual education services they need to fully benefit from the education they receive. The Nation's 3.6 million children of limited-English-proficiency continue to be one of the most undereducated of all groups of American children. H.R. 5231 improves and refines the current Federal bilingual education program while allocating new resources to areas that have shown the greatest need. The bill addresses the themes of excellence and equity which have been so prevalent in many of the recent national reports on the state of American education. It authorizes the allocation of additional resources for bilingual programs, teacher training and retraining, research, and evaluation commensurate with the growth of the population of children at risk. Direction and accountability in the use of Federal funds are increased through provisions mandating additional data collection, evaluation, and monitoring, and clear definitions of essential components of funded programs. The bill also safeguards the current local determination of bilingual program design and student entry and exit criteria. Enactment of this legislation will provide for better data on which to base future policy decisions. It will also provide for increased resources, direction, and assistance for local school districts implementing bilingual programs, and additional support for high quality teacher training and retraining programs.

I thank my colleagues who are participating in this special order and who have cosponsored H.R. 5231 for their help and support in seeing that these important programs receive the attention and consideration they deserve. As the House Education and Labor Committee and this House proceed with consideration of this measure, I look forward to working with my colleagues on its improvement and eventual enactment.●

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, today I would like my colleagues to consider the issue of bilingual education and the needs of our children who are not native English speakers.

Language is the vehicle that we use to learn, communicate and remember. When a child enters the school system with little or no English, he or she is at a disadvantage until English is learned. In order to make this transition it is important that the native language be used to provide general instruction and to teach the new language—English.

There are those who believe that the easiest way to teach a child a new language is to simply throw him in and let him swim. Unfortunately, this process leads to a certain percentage of the children sinking or utilizing all of their energy to merely survive in an alien environment. Such an approach is insensitive to needs of children who learn the new language more slowly because they are older or have less facility with language. All of us who have spent some time struggling with foreign languages can surely appreciate that some individuals are simply more gifted in this area of study than others.

Ideally, each child who enters our system of education will readily learn English. The provisions of H.R. 5231 help to insure this result by mandating the use of the child's native tongue until the transition can be made. It is my hope that my colleagues will understand the continued need to follow this approach and help all students to learn all subjects, including English.●

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to speak on behalf of H.R. 5231, the Academic Equity and Excellence Through Bilingual Education Act of 1984. Bilingual education is an important and necessary vehicle for children with limited English proficiency. The number of children needing bilingual education has increased significantly since 1978 when the act was last amended.

A recent study conducted by the University of Texas at Austin suggests that illiteracy rates may be as high as 56 percent among Hispanics. The educational situation is especially devastating for those Hispanic children of limited English proficiency (LEP). The absence of good educational programs designed to help children become proficient language users has caused many children to be illiterate in both Spanish and English. With these deficiencies in mind, needed revisions to improve the delivery of bilingual education services to LEP children must be implemented.

H.R. 5231 coincides with the recent national emphasis on improving the quality of education available in American public schools. The legislation provides an increased direction and accountability in the Federal bilingual education program; better data on which to base future policy decisions; and increased resources, direction, and assistance for local school districts implementing bilingual programs. The bill also targets the shortage of well-trained bilingual teachers by providing support for retraining and inservice training programs with summer language institutes. The legislation also allows teachers and aides to improve their competency in either English or the native language of their students.

As a member of the Subcommittee on Science, Research and Technology, I am aware of the increasing demands on our educational system to keep pace with technology. Our Nation is approaching a stage at which even the most basic jobs require a higher degree of educational and technical competence. Bilingual education is essential for students with limited English proficiency to acquire the necessary skills to meet the challenges of this era.●

Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Puerto Rico?

There was no objection.

SOCIAL SECURITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, on a beautiful Sunday afternoon, September 7, 1980, I spoke in a broad thoroughfare of the great city of Philadelphia to thousands of senior citizens who were there to hear a representative of the Democratic Party, speaking for the nominee of the Democratic Party for President, and a nominee of the Republican Party, Governor Reagan, who was there speaking for himself.

That afternoon, I spoke, as best I could, introduced by the elder son of President Carter, for the cause of the senior citizens of this country, and I said to that great assembly: Why risk Reagan? You already have in the White House a President known to be dedicated to your cause. He has not made such disquieting statements as are attributed by California papers to Governor Reagan, to the effect that people covered by social security should be permitted to pull out, to resign, to disassociate themselves from social security at any time they chose to do so.

I pointed out that if you made the analogy to an armed force, what kind of an Army could you expect to have if anybody could leave the force any time he wished to do so, what kind of dependability would there be in that kind of an organization.

I pointed out that you could not tell what the benefits to the recipients of social security would be unless you knew how many people were going to be in the program and what sum they were paying in.

So I pointed out that I wondered why the senior citizens should risk a change in the Presidency.

Well, of course, about 45 minutes later along came Governor Reagan and, with his usual charm and his usual eloquence, he swayed the group, especially because he was in the age group of us senior citizens. They thought how fortunate we are to have one of our own age group seeking to be the President of the United States and giving us such warm assurances of his strong support for social security as the President gave.

I have here in my hand a photostatic copy of the Philadelphia Inquirer appearing the morning following the discussion that Mr. Reagan and I gave on the subject of social security and aid to the elderly there in the streets of Philadelphia that afternoon.

Here is the headline: "Reagan in City, vows support of Social Security."

In the body of the article was the following:

Ronald Reagan, one of the country's best known older citizens, told tens of thousands of older persons here yesterday that he would "support and defend" the Social Security System if he were elected President.

A little further on in this article of the morning of September 8, 1980, in the Philadelphia Inquirer, appears the following:

Reagan, who arrived in Philadelphia for an overnight stay with his wife Nancy, also said: "I will see to it that the promises made by government to every older American under the medicare and other programs are kept."

Well, with such assurances as that from a member of the senior citizens age group, from such a charming and ingratiating man, obviously the citizens thought they could rely upon those assurances, and I have no doubt that the majority of the 26 million members of the U.S. citizenry over 65 years of age in 1980 voted for Governor Reagan and helped him become the President of the United States.

When Governor Reagan, then President Reagan, appeared on the Speaker's platform here, and spoke to a joint session of the Congress on February 1, 1981, shortly after he had become President, in his first appearance before a joint session of the Congress, one of his statements was: "We will not cut social security."

A month later, speaking before the National Association of Cities, President Reagan said: "We will not cut social security."

Well, time passed. Just a little while later, in the spring of 1981, then President Reagan addressed the message to the Congress of the United States asking this Congress to cut $88 billion in social security benefits from the senior citizens of this country in the ensuing 5 years. Again, $88 billion.

In every year since 1981, this administration has cut billions of dollars from medicare, forgetting all about that commitment that the President made here from this rostrum: "We will not cut medicare." So, by the end of 1985, this administration, at the present rate at which they are cutting, will have cut from the senior citizens, from the recipients of medicare, from the recipients of disability insurance, from the recipients of old-age and survivors' insurance and from other programs beneficial to the elderly, to the poor, the ill, children, will have cut a total of approximately $104 billion.

That is the humanitarianism that was in the heart of this President, and is in the heart of this President.

Mr. Speaker, I will now yield to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO).

Mr. VENTO. I appreciate the chairman yielding.

I want to first of all, give credit to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER). I think that the gentleman has been an outstanding spokesman for the senior citizens and if it were not for the gentleman standing in the well, I must say that I think that the overwhelming burden of these recommendations that have been made by this administration in the past 3 years, would have fallen on the backs of the elderly in this country. I know the gentleman is going to point out that the President has made now further insights into what is going on with regard to the social security system and what his intention is.

Mr. Speaker, recently President Reagan spoke about our social security system and the Federal expenditures which are necessary to maintain social security and medicare. The President went on to say and I quote, "What we need to do is a revamping of the program."

March 28, 1984 I repeat, President Reagan said what we need is revamping of our social security system. The President's comments on social security are puzzling in light of the fact that just last year in 1983 the Congress passed and the President signed legislation which raises an additional $168 billion in additional revenues to insure the financial solvency of the social security trust funds. In fact, social security is one of the few Federal programs which is financed on a pay-as-you-go basis whereby revenues taken in through the FICA payroll tax go directly to pay for benefits paid out to those persons who are eligible.

President Reagan selected several members of the National Commission on Social Security Reform which developed the proposals which were the basis for the legislation which this Congress passed. The President praised the work of the bipartisan commission on a number of occasions. And yet now, just a little over a year since this legislation was signed into law, the President has suggested that we must revamp social security. Clearly the history of the past years clearly reflect that the Reagan administration, with the full support and weight of President Reagan behind it sought to make deep cuts in the social security program.

In May 1981, the Reagan efforts were heralded as social security reform by the President, but the effect would have devastated the social contract that has persisted on a bipartisan basis for 50 years. The social security disability program reflects most accurately the true intent of President Reagan, nearly one-half million people rumored under the pretense of so called review.

Make no mistake that the bipartisan package last year that Congress enacted was a rebuke to President Reagan, it rejected the scare tactics that the Reagan administration advanced to justify proposed deep cuts in social security benefits. The American people did not buy it then and they will not next year, the American people stand fully behind the social security program and against President Reagan's continued efforts to use the social security payroll tax and benefits cuts to rescue the Reagan bankrupt economic policy.

I am sure that the senior citizens in my district and indeed the millions of Americans all across this country who depend upon our social security system would be most interested in knowing before this November election, just how President Reagan would revamp social security.

If the Reagan administration's actions to date as contained in the President's fiscal year 1985 budget are any indication, then every older American and every American worker who looks forward to their retirement should have reason to be concerned. In the face of skyrocketing costs for health care, the Reagan administration advocates simply shifting all of these cost increases onto the backs of the elderly. On average, the elderly pay over $1,500 a year for medical care. This figure, which is only an average figure, presents a substantial hardship to those senior citizens who are already living on fixed incomes and low incomes.

Let us not fool ourselves or mislead the American people. When the President speaks of revamping social security, this is simply a thinly disguised euphemism for cutting benefits. In light of enormous, unprecedented deficits, that this administration policy has produced are we to place them, the greatest burden on the backs of those who can least afford it; the elderly and the poor. There is every reason to be concerned, deeply concerned.

It appears that President Reagan is going to continue his flip-flop role on social security, with pledges before the 1980 election of not cutting retirement programs and feverish after the election to slash benefits. While social security beneficiaries have largely been spared the effects of the Reagan split personality on this issue. Civil Service and railroad retirees know what Reagan's flip-flops can do.

If the President truly has ideas on how to revamp social security, he should have come forward last year when this Congress and the bipartisan National Commission on Social Security Reform were grappling with this difficult problem and expose them for all to see. This is just one glimpse of what is on the Reagan agenda for 1985, I hope sincerely that it will not become a reality, but fairness would dictate that the Reagan agenda become public knowledge before November.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR).

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I have the same meeting to go to that Mr. VENTO does, and I just want to, if I can, just take a minute or so to commend for calling this special order. The gentleman is really the greatest champion for senior citizens that we have in the country, and we are so lucky to have you. Especially in view of the remarks of the President.

You know, I am looking at the Times quotation from last Thursday, and here is what President Reagan said, he said:

> I have said over and over again talking about social security problems that nothing must be done to penalize those people who are dependent on those checks, but what we need to do—> is a revamping of the program.

And this is the key line—

Now, we know what President Reagan really wants to do to social security when he says revamping. How can we forget what he tried to do in 1981, he tried to raise the age of the recipients; he tried to change the formula of the COLA; he tried to eliminate benefits for women who were heads of the household who had children who needed that benefit and deserved the benefit because you pay into the system for things you hope never happen to you. You hope your husband never dies, but if he does, and you have young children, it is an insurance program that insures you that your children will have some kind of support.

He also wanted to eliminate the burial benefit. I think the thing that was the most blatant form of real antiretiree and just antipoverty stricken, especially the women in this country, was when he wanted to cut the minimum benefit for those individuals receiving a benefit of $122. Who were those people? They were the women, two-thirds were women between 70 and 90 years old and we were able to restore that amount of money for current beneficiaries but we were not able to restore for those who came afterward.

We have to understand something the President does not understand: He does not understand that the average check for a female over 65 is $340 a month and those women, only 10 percent of them have another pension. The average check for a man, they do not do too much better, their average check is $460 a month. Again, that is pretty much it for older people.

Mr. Chairman, I want you to know that I honestly feel that this administration is the most antiretiree administration in many, many years, perhaps in the history of our country. I just want to support your efforts in not letting President Reagan get away with taking money out of a trust fund that is the fund of those people.

I want to commend my friend from Florida, and thank him for his leadership and we certainly will rally behind your efforts in making sure that the President does not touch the social security benefits that are the senior citizens' benefits of this country.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the gentlewoman from Ohio because she has been one of the great champions of the senior citizens as well as all deserving people in this country.

Let me just take a few minutes more to tell this story in a little bit of chronological order. In early 1981 the President asked this Congress to cut $88 billion in the following 5 years from social security benefits. Where did that money come from? He proposed to cut the benefits of those people who retired at 62 by one-third, to discourage early retirement. He did not take into account the fact that about half of the people who retire at 62 do so on account of ill health.

Then he also took away something that seems small, I guess, over in the Office of Management and Budget; he took away the $255 burial allowance for people who did not have any other source of a decent burial. That means that all over this country there were people denied the decent burial from that meager sum that might otherwise have been available to them.

Then the President proposed to cut about one-third of the people on the disability insurance program. There are about 93 million workers covered, and about 3 million of them are disabled. President Reagan proposed to take about one-third of them off of the benefit rolls. Remember, those are people who have already been adjudged by their State disability determination service as being totally helpless and incapacitated and, therefore, not able to earn a livelihood.

He also took away from some 700,000 children of disabled, retired, or deceased parents some of the funds that they were receiving on which to go to college, and cut out all aid to an additional 500,000 students, sons and daughters of people covered by social security. At the same time, he eliminated the minimum benefit, cutting out 3 million people who were receiving but $122 a month under social security. That was cut out.

Finally, the country rebelled, the Congress remonstrated, and said, "We are not going to make these cuts." Then the President said, "All right, let us have a Social Security Commission composed of 15 men and women of both parties." The Speaker honored me by making me one of his appointees to that Commission.

For 13 months, that Commission labored with that crisis in social security. The Republicans, representatives of the administration on that Commission, asked for one thing: reductions in benefits. On the other hand, five of us appointed to the Commission by the Democratic Party said, "We will not agree to any plan to balance this program by cutting benefits." Both sides held out to the bitter end. Finally, in the last 2 hours of the life of the Commission the administration capitulated to a compromise program maintaining the present benefit structure, which 12 of the 15 of us joined in recommending to the Congress. Congress adopted it and the country was happy that at long last we had put to rest the uncertainty about the future of social security.

That was heightened when we had the ceremony over on the south lawn of the White House with the President there on the platform, and the Speaker and I sat right behind the President, and other members of the Commission were there, other high officials of the Congress and the Government were on the platform.

The President, among other things, said the following, and I am quoting now from an editorial in the Daily Oklahoman of April 24, 1983. This is what the President said, and I complimented him, when he came down from the platform, on the excellence of his speech. He said:

Our elderly need no longer fear that the checks they depend on will be stopped or reduced.

He said:

The legislation assures those who are still working—and that means people not yet receiving social security—that they, too, have a pact with the future. From this day forward they have our pledge that they will get their fair share of benefits when they retire.

The Speaker made a similar statement and from that day on we have been telling the American people about that agreement between the Executive and the Congress. We were assuring the people that for the next 75 years social security was solvent and sound and the benefits would not be reduced or lowered.

Now, then, let me come to the last sad part of this chapter.

On March 28, 1984, in the Oval Office of the President in the White House, the President had a press conference, and here are some of the things he said to the questioners at the press conference. This interview appeared in the New York Times of March 29, 1984:

QUESTION. Excuse me. You had mentioned last week in passing that you saw the need at some point to restructure social security for new workers coming into the program. Could you elaborate on that?

The PRESIDENT. I think we have to. We have to look at the whole governmental structure, and this includes the entitlement programs. There have been demographic changes that have been ignored that make some policies now leading inevitably toward another day of reckoning if we do not reorder these programs. About half of your deficit has been structural. About half of your deficit has been cyclical, the result of the recessions.

A little bit later, the questioner from the New York Times said:

Can you be more specific about what you would do for medicare and social security?

The PRESIDENT. No; not really, because this is something that is going to require thorough study to insure that you do not pull the rug out from under anyone who is presently dependent on those programs.

He forgot all about the young workers of whom just last year he said had a pact with the future. The President's assurance would apply only to those who "are dependent" on these programs at the present.

They must not be frightened as they were by political demagoguery as they were in the 1982 campaign when our opponents took advantage of the fact that social security—the program was facing, and by our date as of July 1983—facing outright bankruptcy.

We just told the truth about what President Reagan and his administration had done. It was not demagoguery; it was fact.

Later in the interview the President said:

I have tried, and everyone seemed to ignore it. I have said over and over again in talking about social security's problem, that nothing must be done to penalize those people who are now dependent on those checks—if you are already covered you will keep on getting them—but what we need to do is a revamping of the program. We finally, then, when the election was over and the demagoguery stopped—

But the questioner said:

But isn't it risky now, in an election year, for you to say that we should revamp and restructure these programs without being specific.

The PRESIDENT. No; as long as they understand and as long as you print that what I said, that there is no intention on the part of anyone of taking away from those people now getting.

In other words, he said if you are now receiving benefits, you will keep on receiving them; but if tomorrow you begin to be a recipient, it is going to be a new ball game.

Finally, the President said:

Now I read in one of these interviews with one of the Presidential candidates on the other party was claiming that there is no problem with social security at all because it is safe until the end of the century. Well, 1984 is not too far away from the end of the century.

How can he so carelessly dismiss the fact that those same people out there—who, as you have said, can be frightened if someone is saying to them, "Yes, the program is going to run into another financial bind."

But the President does not offer any suggestion for solving the problem as long as it is in the context that we are not going to pull the rug out from under anyone who is presently dependent on those programs.

Let me say this in conclusion: Now the President has opened another can of worms. The President has now gone back on the solemn pledge that he made as the President of the United States to the people of America. The President is now undoing a difficult solution that was arrived at by compromise and approved by this House. Now he wants to go back again and tell those who have not yet begun to receive their paychecks, "Well, we will change it any way we want to, and let you keep on paying in but you may not be certain of getting anything out that you are entitled to receive."

I just want the people of this country to know that the issue is again fresh in the political arena of this Nation. The only way the people of this country can depend upon the fact that the social security system that we now have is going to be the social security system of the future and that what people are now receiving will be available to those who become eligible in the years ahead is to elect a Democratic President of the United States and a Congress who will not go back on their promise to the American people.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York with great pleasure.

□ 1710

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, first I want to commend the gentleman from Florida, my dear friend and the apostle for the elderly, not simply in his district of the United States, but throughout the world. I attended the first Aging Conference in Vienna with the gentleman from Miami and it thrilled me to know that he was recognized by representatives from countries unknown to many. I commend him for his indefatigable participation in the advocacy of problems of the elderly.

Mr. Speaker, as an original member of the House Select Committee on Aging, I am pleased to join with our most distinguished member, Senator CLAUDE PEPPER for this special order today.

I also represent the 19th Congressional District of New York which according to the Bureau of the Census ranks No. 10 out of 435 congressional districts in both the number and percentage of citizens over the age of 65.

There is a popular television commercial which features the line "When E.F. Hutton Talks—People Listen." When the President of the United States talks about a subject of dire importance to 36 million people—these people and others listen. So it was when the President gave an interview last week with the New York Times and the topic of social security came up. He talked, people listened, and got real scared.

Because of some of his comments, we are here today in effect to assure the present and future senior citizens of this Nation that we do not plan to wait for the other shoe to fall before we act to avert any further tampering with social security.

The phrases that the President used that concern me the most include that social security was heading toward "another day of reckoning, if we do not reorder those programs." Or—to the question "Can't you be more specific about what you would do for medicare and social security?" The answer: "No—not really because this is something that is going to require thorough study to insure that you do not pull the rug out from under anyone who presently depended on those programs. They must not be frightened."

Later this other exchange concerned me—to the question, "If you could be more specific—you could put some of these fears to rest now couldn't you?" The answer: "Well I tried and everyone seemed to ignore it. I have said over and over again in talking about social security problems—that nothing must be done to penalize those people who are now dependent on those checks. But what we need to do is a revamping of the program."

It seems to me and to many others in the Congress that we did precisely that about 1 year ago with the passage of the Social Security Reform Act.

It seems to the millions of elderly who had to go 18 long months between increases in their COLA—that they made this sacrifice as part of a major legislative revamping of the program.

It seems to me that the actuaries of the social security system—those nonpartisan accounts—said that the bill of last year will make the system financially healthy for the next 75 years.

It seems to me that those senior citizens who are now having to pay a first time tax on part of their social security benefits—feel that they have sacrificed enough.

The question is, Why the comments—are they a forerunner of a new administration initiative to try and further renegotiate the terms of the covenant which social security once was between the American worker and the Government?

I for one hope not—and more relevantly do not see why there would be a need to do anything else to social security.

One must remember that we must go beyond just protecting those who are presently dependent on social security. There are millions of Americans in this Nation approaching the age of eligibility—men and women who have contributed funds from their paychecks into social security—who have the same right to be guaranteed that their benefits will be provided as those presently receiving benefits.

If there is any lingering need for reforms in social security it would likely be in the area of reducing fraud abuse and waste in the system. Beyond that—leave it alone.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend for his excellent remarks.

I yield to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. FRANK).

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I thank him for once again putting all of us in this country in his debt by calling attention to these statements that the President made.

The gentleman from Florida has been a strong friend, not just of the elderly, but of even a more numerous group and one to which I belong, those of us who hope some day to become elderly, because the chilling thing in the President's remarks were his suggestions that he is prepared not further to reduce, and there have already been some reductions, but not further to reduce benefits for existing social security recipients, but that if reelected, he plans to make proposals which would lead to the reduction of social security benefits for those of us who are now working. There is no other interpretation one can put on the President's remarks.

Now, it is possible to suggest, as some might, that the President often talks to no particular purpose at all; but if we assume that the President when he spoke was speaking to some purpose, it can only have been to suggest that there should be some reduction of benefits for those now working, because the President carefully said, "I'm not going to tell you what I think. I made the mistake," he said, "in previous years of giving an indication of my views and the voters didn't like it."

He objected to the fact how much people should be allowed to receive on social security became a political issue. I think that is an unfortunate remark by the President. Of course, in a democracy those are legitimate subjects for debate; so as the gentleman from Florida has pointed out, what we have from the President last week is a statement that he has got some intention and some inclination, apparently, to reduce benefits for those who are not yet on social security, which he does not want to share with the American people. He wants first to get safely reelected and then he wants to come in and make those changes.

I think it is important that we make clear that there is no need to do this. This is the President of the United States who wants to spend additional billions on the military, who gave us the payment in kind agriculture program, who has got the Star Wars space defense for many, many more billions. There simply is no financial necessity further to threaten those now working with reductions in time and pay.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRANK. I do not have the time, and the gentleman will have plenty of time; the cavalry having arrived, I am sure they will get their chance.

Mr. CONABLE. The cavalry has been here for some time, may I say.

Mr. FRANK. Well, I saw the cavalry arrive.

I look forward to hearing the gentleman from New York, with all his persuasive powers, try to save the President from his latest blurting out of what he was apparently thinking. I know it is a fulltime job for Members of the other party to try to keep the President from saying too much before the election of what he may intend to do, but I think we have a right to point out what are the clear implications of that.

There is simply no other interpretation but that the President plans, if reelected, to make some reductions There simply is, I think, no justification for a President proposing the multibillion-dollar excesses that he wants to give the Pentagon and then threatening working people with a reduction of what they are going to need in retirement.

I once again want to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Florida for his leadership.

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the gentleman for his eloquent statement.

I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MOAKLEY), my friend.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman. I commend the gentleman from Florida for taking this time out to make known to the American people just exactly what the President was referring to in his latest statement.

Mr. Speaker, last Thursday's New York Times carried an interview with President Reagan in which he suggested that the social security system needs to be "revamped." Many of my colleagues were amazed that the President would choose to open what most experts now consider to be a closed issue.

I am frankly puzzled over the shock and surprise which greeted the President's remarks. Ronald Reagan has been called many things but "the best friend social security has ever had" is not one of them. Before his election to the Presidency Mr. Reagan had consistently called for a voluntary social security system, a scheme which at best represents a basic misunderstanding of the fundamental principles of social insurance.

Immediately after his election President Reagan told Congress that a balanced budget depended upon enactment of his economic program which included $35 billion in social security cuts over the next 5 years. Riding on the tide of the 1980 Republican electoral sweep, a majority of these reductions sailed through Congress over the objections of the Democratic Party. Although these cuts were unprecedented in their scope, they were only a hint of what was to come.

Over the next few months, the administration embarked on a campaign designed to destroy the confidence of the American people in their social security system. Congress was told by the President's Director of the Office of Management and Budget that in November 1982 "the greatest bankruptcy in the history of our country" would occur, and that the benefit checks upon which millions depended could no longer be sent out. While the chicken-little cries of "bankruptcy" and "impending disaster" echoed from a vast array of his own administration spokesmen, President Reagan solemnly deplored the use of "scare tactics" and "demagoguery" because of his great concern that senior citizens not be frightened.

Perhaps they were frightened because the President kept insisting that only massive benefit reductions could restore social security to a sound footing. Perhaps they were concerned that the President stood stubbornly against the use of any additional revenues for the very program he insisted was on the brink of disaster. Perhaps they were confused by the meaning of his often contradictory pledges.

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, most of the Reagan proposals never became enacted. The passage of the 1983 Social Security Act Amendments restored actuarial balance to the system. While the amendments included temporary sacrifice for recipients as well as for workers, no major restructuring of benefits occurred because none was needed.

Apparently now the President feels as if he has missed his chance. Why else would he now urge a revamping of the very system he assured the American people was solvent and secure just a year ago, when he signed the social security amendments into law?

Social security is not only the lifeblood of its 36 million beneficiaries, it offers vital protection to the over 115 million contributing workers and their dependents from loss of income due to old age, disability, and death. Social security is an intergenerational compact, supported by the faith of contributing workers in the integrity of the U.S. Government to uphold its commitment to them. President Reagan himself acknowledged this when he wrote 1 year ago that the 1983 Social Security Amendments would assure "those who are still working that they too, have a pact with the future." The President is fooling no one therefore, when he promises that "those now dependent on their checks" will not be penalized by a revamping of the program.

Some may consider reducing the benefits of young workers far off into the future the politically expedient thing to do. Others may even tout it as an "act of courage." I fail to see how reducing the incomes of the elderly and disabled constitutes "courage," simply because they are affected in the distant future.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the distinguished gentleman from Florida for taking this special order to call the attention of this House to the latest threat from this administration to the social security program.

□ 1720

Mr. PEPPER. I thank my distinguished friend for his able contribution.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I want to join my colleagues in thanking the gentleman from Florida for his constant vigil. He is always here, always watching, and thank goodness we have you.

I want to interject in here just a little bipartisan criticism, because when you look at March 29, it was a bad day not only for Republicans but for Democrats in my area because my silly Governor shot off his mouth, too. And my Governor is a Democrat, and he made some very stupid remarks from my standpoint, and I think they are wrong.

So in a bipartisan spirit I would hope all of us would stand up and attack those who say things that are absolutely wrong and are not what America stands for.

America is a community. America is a community where we help people who need to be helped. It is not a playing field where we just help those who are on our team. We are here to help and we reach out to others, and seniors have been doing that their entire life and it is very cruel to then scare them through all sorts of intimations that if reelected I may do something, but I am not going to tell you what because, of course, it will take more study. And any of us who point that out are suddenly demagogs.

I do not think we are demagogs at all. I think it is only fair in our system that you state what you are going to do before you are elected and not wait until after and then spring surprises. When these kinds of slips come out you get some idea of what is going on in someone's mind and especially when you see the many devastating things that have been reported and asked for before, then you certainly see the trend.

So I want to say that it is a tough day for everybody and it is especially tough if you are older because you keep wondering what do politicians really think. They all tell us they love us in November but in December they tell us, "Guess what, we are going to have to do something here." No wonder they are suspicious of politicians on both sides of the aisle.

I must say, as many people know, I have a candidate running for President right now who has trouble with his age. He was a gentleman and did not say why. But can you imagine in my State how nervous you would be if our Governor came to you and said, "My, you are looking old." You would be scared to death.

So people in my State worry a whole lot about their age. And I think when you see what the President then is saying about social security, and he is in the other party, you also worry about your age because you never know what it is going to be like when you finally get there.

So let us all work together, reach across the aisle, lower all of that rhetoric, stop the politics of selfishness. And you can play that, you can play the politics of selfishness on young people. But that is wrong, and we must stop it, and the politics of selfishness must stop. That generation did not play the politics of selfishness and they do not deserve to be treated this way and we are not going to stand for that in this day and age.

I compliment the gentleman from Florida for allowing us to have this dialog and thank him very much.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the distinguished gentlewoman very warmly for her valuable contribution.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PEPPER. I yield to my distinguished friend from Texas, Mr. PICKLE, who had so much to do with the adoption of the commission report in 1982.

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Florida who has shown as much care and concern for our elderly as any person who has ever served our Government for holding this special order this afternoon. If he had not been disturbed and dismayed by the interview which the President gave to a reporter in the New York Times, he would not be doing this. The very mention of the revision of the social security laws causes one to be concerned and even alarmed.

I can see why the gentleman would ask for this special order.

The implication of the President's remarks to the press is that social security may be in trouble and, therefore, we have to make some immediate changes.

I do not believe that the President intended to leave that impression, and I want to make it plain that I do not believe that that was his intent. Yet the average person reading those remarks would certainly start worrying and particularly our elderly. They would start worrying, and asking what is going to happen, and why are we getting into this again so soon?

I would say that we ought to remind the American people at this point that the social security trust funds are doing well today, as well as we had hoped, and perhaps a little bit better than when we passed the 1983 Social Security Amendments last spring.

Two things we ought to keep in mind. First, the latest social security trustees' report shows that the system is in actuarial balance. That is encouraging for all recipients of social security benefits.

Second, the President's budget shows that the system is in balance. Representatives of both the White House and the OMB have said that the trust funds are in balance.

There is always a possibility that under dire economic conditions we would have to take another look at social security. That would be true for all our Federal programs under such circumstances. But the economy is performing better than we projected a year ago and this has resulted in a strong recovery for our OASDI trust funds.

Since all of the responsible economic reports indicate that the OASDI trust funds are in balance, people ought not to use scare tactics to frighten the public or to say that we have got to make some immediate changes to avoid insolvency. I think it is unfortunate when any individual or group mentions this subject in this light. That is true whether it is made by the Committee on Economic Development who made such a broad cautionary statement and perhaps critical statement about 3 weeks ago, or whether it is the President, or even one of our former colleague's organizations represented by former member Jimmy Roosevelt. Such comments and reports frighten people needlessly and that ought not to be.

So I say that we ought to remember that the changes we made this last year were significant and they are substantive. Our trust funds are in actuarial balance and our economic projections are on target. We are doing well at this point.

I further want to say to the gentleman from Florida that while these 1983 amendments were long term and comprehensive in scope, it is still important that we exercise viligent oversight to insure the efficient administration of a program which meets the needs of all our citizens. Improvements can always be made in any system.

The Social Security Subcommittee later this year will hold oversight hearings on the administration of the social security program. We are going to try to find more efficient ways to handle this program. The administration of the program can be improved to insure that the benefits get to recipients more quickly and more efficiently. We should do more to provide information and assistance to all beneficiaries. We must make sure that all beneficiaries, men and women, are treated equitably. We must look at the whole program as we go along. Just as we did in the case of the disability insurance program last week we must consider substantive, programmatic reforms in the administration of social security. That is an ongoing concern of our subcommittee and it should be done.

In conclusion I would say to you that the American people ought to feel confident, both the elderly and the young, that our trust funds now are in order and they are doing well. We believe they will continue to be secure.

Why the President would want to bring up this subject and leave the impression that people might not be sure of their benefits and be scared, is beyond me.

So I want to give him credit, that he was not trying to scare people, but the fact that he brought it up leaves a great deal of apprehension if not fear. I would hope that we can lay that fear aside and that we not be forced to respond to these kinds of apprehensions, because it is not necessary.

I would hope as we go along in our work this year we can give that assurance again to the American people.

So, I thank the gentleman for taking this time and for expressing his dismay; which we all share, and to say to him that we will be looking at this program to improve it as we go along this fall.

I invite the gentleman's attention because he makes as much a contribution to our social security program and other programs for the aged as any man who ever lived.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the distinguished gentleman, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Social Security he has been a tower of strength for that worthy cause. I am glad to hear the statement.

I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONABLE. I thank the gentleman from Florida for yielding to me and also thank the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PICKLE) for having put some perspective on the discussion that has been going on here.

I regret I was occupied elsewhere and could not hear in detail the gentleman's remarks.

Like him, I think it is important that the American people not be frightened on this issue.

There is either a bad echo in here or a strong sense of deja entendu, because a lot of this talk seems quite similar to what we have heard before.

I am sure the gentleman from Florida would not bring this issue up for any partisan purpose, knowing that he is a champion of all the people; elderly and middle aged alike. And I am sure that he would acknowledge that the President's remarks in no way threatened benefit reductions for those currently dependent on social security.

I would like to ask the gentleman, however, if he does not feel that it may be possible at some time in the future that we may want to improve social security benefits in some way? Are we, for instance, locked into the system the way it is now, carefully designed for the work force of 1935? Or can we hope at some time in the future to improve benefits?

May I ask the gentleman?

Mr. PEPPER. I say I answer my friend with great pleasure.

I have said many times that we hope the state of our economy in the years to come will permit us to improve social security, because my understanding is that the average social security check received by 36 million Americans every month is about $400.

Also, I will say to my friend, improving the social security system in the future is something that is quite different from telling the people that are going to be covered by social security in the future, who are not now covered "we do not know what you are going to get."

Mr. CONABLE. Well, my I say that any improvement would involve a structural change also, would it not, in the system? And would it not require just exhortation by the President, but legislation by the Congress?

Mr. PEPPER. Let me say to my distinguished friend, he was one of the distinguished members of the Social Security Commission with whom I had the privilege of working and being a member. I was shocked when I saw anything like what the President said.

I have been complimenting the President for his part in working out that compromise. It had in it a lot of the things all of us did not like in some respect, but 12 of us agreed to it because we thought it was the best overall package.

I complimented President Reagan when he walked down off the platform. "That was a magnificent statement you made," because I read an excerpt from it here a while ago. I thought and I have been telling people all over the country, that the President, any President, the Congress, any Congress, has issued a moral commitment to the seniors and young workers of this country; we will maintain social security solvent and sound at the present level of benefits for at least the next 75 years.

Now the President, as the gentleman from Texas said, is opening up the whole can of worms again.

Mr. CONABLE. May I say to my friend that he will not deny that we must constantly be vigilant that the social security system operate for the benefit of all the people of this country.

And as I read the President's statement, that is what he was discussing also.

The gentleman would have to read into the President's remarks something that was not there if he were to decide that the President was threatening reduction.

May I say to the gentleman from Florida that the biggest current threat to the social security beneficiaries of this country is a proposal from some of the members of his own party in the upcoming budget that we go to a procedure of cost-of-living minus 2 percent for the non-need related entitlements.

Now I hope he will be as vigilant in excoriating the members of his own party who want to cut benefits for social security beneficiaries as he is in reading into the President's statement some threat to the current beneficiaries or some threat to future beneficiaries.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, it is clear to me that the social security system can and must be improved over the years with respect to such things as the benefits for working women.

The gentlewoman from Colorado took the position that nothing should be changed. I am sure she would not want to imply that we cannot benefit working women through the social security system at some time in the future when the solvency of the system will permit it, we cannot benefit them in some way, that we are locked into the current form of social security which has been rigidified by the politics of fear over the years.

We are so afraid to deal with that issue that we do not change anything, and as a result, we do not improve it. We just are locked in. And if we are on a bankruptcy course we seem to be incapable of doing it.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that the President of the United States took the initiative in calling for a commission on which the gentleman from Florida and I both served and without that commission, I fear that we would still be cowering before the bankruptcy of the social security system and there would be justification for the people of this country fearing for the future of their benefits.

On the basis of his statement, I do not believe there is anything that can be said about the President's advocating anything that would be to the detriment of the beneficiaries of this system. And I personally deeply regret any effort to read into that unnamed fears for people who are already insecure about their security system.

Mr. PEPPER. Let me share with my friend what concerns me so deeply about what the President said. Prior to the effort and the action of our joint commission, young people all over this country were very bitter. Many of them said to me from time to time, "All you all are doing is ripping us off with this social security system that you have got. When we get out there, eligible to receive any benefits, either there won't be any social security system or there won't be any money."

Mr. CONABLE. They have no reason to believe that any more.

Mr. PEPPER. Wait just a minute. I tried to allay the fears of these young people. But until our joint commission issued its report and it was adopted by the Congress and the President made the strong statement that he did, and here in his language, and Congress made the strong statement that it did, I noticed immediately a great difference in the attitude of the young people.

They would walk up to me in the airports around over the country and say: "We want to thank you all for what you are doing for social security." We had restored their faith in the social security system.

Mr. CONABLE. And properly so.

Mr. PEPPER. We were so proud of it. I never dreamed that I would witness what I saw yesterday afternoon when I heard two Democrats here in this House talking about wanting to institute 2-percent cut in social security as part of the budget. I got up and upbraided them. I said, "You do not know what you are talking about. We made a moral commitment to the people of this country."

Mr. CONABLE. Right on.

Mr. PEPPER. They want to tear it up.

I cannot believe that the young people will not be shocked when the President says that: "all I am saying is we are going to keep the system sound for the people that are now receiving their checks; but we are not making any commitment for anybody who has not yet started to receive a check."

I wish the President had not said that, and would have stood on his own earlier statement and let the commitment that we made not be impeached or impaired by any remark he might make.

Mr. CONABLE. If the gentleman will yield for one further moment. I hope the statement of the President of the United States will be permitted to stand as it was and will not be interpreted in ways that would engender additional fears among people who have already feared too much about this system which means so much to the gentleman from Florida, so much to me, so much to the young people as well as the old people of this country.

We have a right to a little tranquil possession of the system as it is.

However, I would not want to stand in the way of revamping it at some time in the future to improve benefits if, as I believe to be the case, the formula which the gentleman and I had a part in working out happens to be as successful in stabilizing the system and building up a surplus as I believe it will be.

Mr. PEPPER. I will say only in conclusion to my friend, I have only referred to the language that our President used, that he was obviously not talking about maintaining the present level of social security for the workers yet to become the beneficiaries of that program.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

MERGERS AND JOINT VENTURES IN THE OIL INDUSTRY AND AUTO INDUSTRY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FLORIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, in the last few weeks my subcommittee has held hearings on mergers and joint ventures in the oil industry and the automobile industry. I have come out of those hearings even more troubled than before, and I am pleased to have the opportunity to explain why.

When I introduced H.R. 5153 to establish a moratorium on mergers, I said the current unprecedented wave of megamergers raises a number of urgent questions.

Are we watching the energy life blood of our industrial might dripping away as talent and resources are poured into financial manipulation and the search for ever greater tax advantages? As tens of billions of dollars are tied up in merger battles and companies are mortgaged in the parry and thrust of takeover struggles, are we allowing a process that is destroying the incentive to explore for oil, distorting capital markets, and pushing up interest rates? Are we permitting a rising concentration of crude resources in a few hands so that in a moment of foreign crisis and oil cutoff, military and foreign policy options could be jeopardized? And where in all this are the antitrust enforcement agencies? If they view the oil industry as sufficiently decentralized that mergers do not trigger antitrust enforcement, is there something wrong with the antitrust laws, or with enforcement, or is something required that goes beyond antitrust?

The oil industry megamergers have caught our attention. But they are not the whole story. The Federal Trade Commission has given a tentative green light to a production joint venture between General Motors and Toyota—two of the giants of the worldwide automobile industry. Critics of the venture contend it is not only a plain violation of the antitrust laws, but part of a trend that will result in the export of hundreds of thousands of jobs. These critics say that by arranging for sophisticated input abroad, such ventures will leave the domestic auto industry with a shrinking base of low pay, low value jobs.

We are witnessing upheavals in industry after industry that have formed the foundations of our industrial might. In considering proposed steel industry mergers, there has been a dramatic split within the administration, with controversy over the relationship between merger policy and trade barriers.

While we in Congress have been debating the pros and cons of "industrial policy," they have been rewriting the industrial policy of the country in the board rooms and the investment banking offices of America. To the degree that this involves determination of public policy on matters such as defense, employment, competition, and trade, there must be public accountability. The alternative is to discard what has previously been understood by the terms "free enterprise" and "free government." Perhaps there are those who are comfortable with such a course; I am not.

Unfortunately, our hearings on the merger wave have not dispelled my earlier concerns. We heard assertions that the mergers will produce efficiencies, but the support for these claims was lacking or open to serious question. We heard a good deal of talk about the shrinking of demand and about overcapacity in the petroleum industry as a justification for the mergers. But these arguments only served to raise my apprehensions about our ability to deal with an oil cutoff during an international crisis. They only served to raise new doubts in my mind about the drag that our new de facto energy policy may impose on our ability to revitalize the economy.

We also heard candid admissions that financial and tax motives, rather than growth and production, are driving consolidation. It was suggested, for example, that the largest merger in American history should be permitted not primarily because of its positive impact, but to avoid the consequences of a hostile takeover. Additionally, recent events have cast doubt on the effectiveness of current procedures for reviewing mergers. Proposals for vast industry restructuring are considered under short deadlines and mergers may be allowed to go forward before the viability of divestiture plans can be ascertained. Finally, we heard consistent testimony from responsible government officials indicating that current policy has little, if any, regard for the consequences of all this for the maintenance of smaller businesses, diversity, and jobs.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear to me that we need a better evaluation of these issues before it is too late. That is why I have introduced H.R. 5153 to create a merger moratorium. I urge my colleagues to support such a measure. In the real world, the public interest does not prevail in the game of monopoly.●

SCIENTIFIC EXCHANGES WITH THE SOVIETS: IMPORTANT TO PROGRESS AND TO PEACE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, last month's issue of Physics Today editorialized about the need to renew scientific exchange programs between the United States and the Soviet Union. The editorial cites scientific opinion that termination of such exchanges has not been effective in bringing about change in Soviet policies. The continued abusive treatment of a whole range of dissident Soviet scientists serves to confirm that perspective.

Both to help assure that simple misunderstandings do not lead to even further worsening of tensions and to avoid missing opportunities for scientific developments of mutual benefit, the administration should move to restore reasonable, beneficial scientific exchanges. I encourage my colleagues to read the editorial in its entirety and to do what you can to prompt resumption of these peaceful, productive exchanges.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

RESTORING UNITED STATES-SOVIET COMMUNICATIONS IN SCIENCE

The alarming deterioration in U.S.-Soviet diplomatic relations prompts us to call on the U.S. physics community to join ranks and work together at restoring communications with our Soviet colleagues. For the past decade, U.S. physicists have been split over how to respond to the Soviet government's unconscionable treatment of dissidents. Some physicists, while deploring the Soviet actions, have tried to maintain their contacts in the U.S.S.R.; others have chosen to boycott all opportunities for contact with Soviet physicists. Four years ago, the National Academy of Sciences lent its weight to the latter approach when it cancelled all bilateral scientific meetings with the Soviet Academy of Science. Two years later, the U.S. government, in reaction to the situation in Poland, did not renew the bilateral agreement on cooperation in science and technology.

It is still a matter for debate whether the boycotts by scientists have succeeded in their goal of ameliorating the Soviet government's policy towards dissidents. However, there can be no disagreement that the boycotts together with the hard-line positions of both governments have choked off scientific communications between physicists in the two countries to an historically low level. In January (page 9) Timothy Toohig reported that the last joint high-energy physics program using a Soviet accelerator has come to an end. Whether because of personal choice or lack of opportunity, many prominent U.S. physicists, who previously were frequent visitors to the U.S.S.R., have not been there for several years. Certainly, as a result, physics has suffered on both sides of the world.

Now is the time to give priority to revitalizing our channels of communication with Soviet physicists in the interests both of scientific progress and of maintaining contact with the more reasonable elements of Soviet society. Given the current deeply troubled Soviet-American relationship, the U.S. physics community can no longer have a realistic hope of exerting any influence on the Soviet government. In 1980 Herman Feshbach wrote on this page (in arguing against boycotts) that their effect would be a minor perturbation to the actions of the two governments. No one can doubt that this is the situation today.

The first Soviet physicists to visit the postwar U.S. attended the 1956 Rochester Conference at the invitation of Robert Marshak. During the 1960s Marshak headed the National Academy exchange program with Eastern Europe but later, with the advent of the dissident problem, was himself deeply conflicted about maintaining communications. As this page went to press, Marshak gave us the following comment:

"During the 1970s I shared the view of other scientists that boycotting meetings in the Soviet Union would help to moderate its harsh treatment of dissidents and refuseniks, and, in some instances, it paid off. However, in the present dangerous political climate, boycotts will be ineffectual and will deepen suspicion and recrimination. I believe that American scientists can now make a positive contribution to the reduction of tension and to human rights by seeking vigorous dialog with Soviet colleagues at all levels."

We urge physicists to follow Marshak's lead and work at finding ways to enhance communciations as individuals through correspondence and visits or by encouraging institutions to revive formal exchanges. The road may not be easy, as Norman Zabusky can attest (he was recently expelled from the U.S.S.R. for agreeing to lecture at a "Saturday Evening Seminar"; see January, page 75). The policies of both governments (such as the U.S. regulations on information export) will present obstacles. But both Toohig and Zabusky agree that Soviet physicists as individuals are warmly receptive to renewed contacts. Physicists in the East and West who succeed in this endeavor will have performed a service to both their discipline and their country.●

LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH A COMMISSION ON CAPITAL MARKETS AND IMPOSE A MORATORIUM ON FORMATION OF COMBINED INSURANCE, BANKING, AND SECURITIES ORGANIZATIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. WIRTH) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to impose an 18-month moratorium on combinations between securities firms, insurance companies and banks and their activities, and on combinations involving these intermediaries and nonfinancial firms and activities. This bill also incorporates the Capital Markets Commission bill which I reintroduced last June with 64 cosponsors to insure that issues raised by current and prospective changes in financial structure and regulation will be evaluated during the time in which the proposed moratorium is in effect.

Joining me today are the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, JOHN D. DINGELL, and my colleagues on the subcommittee, Representatives EDWARD J. MARKEY, AL SWIFT, MICKEY LELAND, JOHN BRYANT, JIM BATES, HENRY WAXMAN, and JIM SCHEUER.

The issue of financial restructuring has become a priority concern for Congress. Chairman ST GERMAIN has already introduced a moratorium bill and has announced that the Banking Committee will hold hearings on the impact of financial restructuring from a broad public policy perspective. Recently, Chairman DINGELL of the Energy and Commerce Committee announced his support for a moratorium and further study of the issues before permanent legislation is enacted. I believe the constructive efforts of these two distinguished chairmen will help refocus the debate on these issues, and I look forward to working with them in developing a consensus on how to proceed.

It is clear that the dramatic changes occurring in our financial markets cannot be ignored. New financial products have been introduced that have reinforced the shift from long- to short-term financial investment prompted by earlier inflationary pressures. Technological innovations have facilitated the development of these products, many of which enable the functions of one financial sector to spill over into the historic turf of others. Functional barriers between financial sectors and markets are being eroded in other ways as well. Both Federal regulators and the States have issued new regulations that violate the intent of the Glass-Steagall Act and have the potential for precipitating major structural changes in the financial system. Based on these expansive interpretations of existing law, mergers and acquisitions between institutions in formerly segregated financial sectors are proliferating. The result has been an erosion of coherence in the regulatory framework that threatens the soundness of the financial system and a change in the distribution of savings and credit that could significantly impair the outlook for balanced economic growth.

The Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection, and Finance which I chair has held seven hearings dealing with various aspects of financial restructuring beginning with an examination of changes in the capital markets in 1981. Our first hearing in this Congress—in April 1983—dealt with the concern that the shift from long-term investment needed to finance capital formation to short-term investments providing liquidity for investors could impair future economic growth. Hearings in June 1983, focused on the FDIC proposal to allow State nonmember banks to underwrite corporate securities in violation of the intent of the Glass-Steagall Act. In July, the subcommittee heard testimony on the role of financial regulation is allocating capital and credit and on the impact of changes in financial functions and products on the economy. These and other concerns also formed the basis for a hearing in New York in December to examine changes in financial structure and regulation from a State perspective.

Since 1981, I have taken the position that a thorough analysis of the effects of a changing financial environment on the Nation's economy is imperative. While the Capital Markets Commission proposal has been well received, such an analysis has not taken place and no comprehensive alternative approaches have been offered. Instead the pace of change escalated and last year's developments made clear that a continuation of haphazard decisions by Federal and State regulatory authorities was both destabilizing and irrational.

Given the inherent inequities of a moratorium, my support for the proposal has been slow in coming. But I now believe that a reasonably fair moratorium may be the only way to force consideration of the fundamental public policy issues in the short term. However, most of the moratorium bills that have been introduced are unfair to banks in view of the changes that are taking place in other financial sectors. It restricts them while giving securities, insurance and commercial firms far more leeway to cross the traditional boundaries. My legislation corrects that inequity.

A number of bills dealing with financial restructuring have already been introduced, and several are pending before the Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection, and Finance. So far, most of these legislative proposals, which reflect a wide range of views, focus on defining the permissible range of activities of banks, and therefore on defining who is permitted to own or control banks. However, as distinctions between financial products have become blurred, the traditional emphasis on banking law as the vehicle for defining financial structure is less effective. Changes in State laws and regulation governing the permissible range of activities of insurance companies and the trend toward mergers of insurance and securities intermediaries, suggest that we need to look at the implications of these developments as well.

These changes have significant implications for the competitive and regulatory environment in which financial intermediaries function. They fundamentally affect traditional regulatory concerns about customer protection, fair access to capital and credit, conflicts of interest, and the concentration of financial resources. They also raise important questions about the soundness of our financial system. Because a growing tendency toward interdependence between financial intermediaries and markets at home and abroad has increased the risk of systemic crises, the wisdom of permitting a further consolidation of financial functions must be evaluated in terms of the threat it may pose to soundness.

The bill also addresses the issue of the trend toward combinations between financial and nonfinancial activities. Again, most of the concern in this area has centered primarily on banking functions and was most clearly enunciated in the Zaibatsu debates in 1969-70 on the Bank Holding Company Act Amendments. However, as the Baldwin-United bankruptcy has demonstrated, possible conflicts of interest that adversely affect customers of financial intermediaries can arise as easily in cases involving combinations of nonfinancial and nonbanking financial firms as in cases involving banks. Concerns about potential concentrations of financial and nonfinancial resources are no less valid.

The bill attempts to deal with these concerns by prohibiting additional movements by nonfinancial firms into the three primary financial sectors—securities, insurance, and banking—and additional consolidations of firms and functions involving these financial sectors pending a thorough review of the issues involved. Existing combinations of firms and activities would be grandfathered. But because a moratorium gives advantages to those who have already entered into mergers, acquisitions and new activities, the bill tries to soften this inherent unfairness by prohibiting an expansion of outlawed combinations.

The bill proposes that such a review of the issues involved in financial restructuring be undertaken within the next 18 months by an independent commission appointed by Congress. The commission would work closely with Congress to insure that changes in financial structure will be authorized together with appropriate changes in the regulatory framework. A coherent and rational regulatory framework is not likely to evolve if the direction of change continues to be determined by expansive interpretations of current law by individual Federal regulators or by changes in law authorized by individual State legislatures.

The purpose of the commission is not just to study the issues, but also to help build a consensus for permanent reform legislation. Its membership would include those who use the financial system as well as the intermediaries whose role is to channel funds between investors and borrowers. So far, the debate's focus has been on the interests of the intermediaries and has reflected their concerns about dividing up the pie in terms of attracting funds. Almost no attention has been paid to considerations about how regulatory changes will alter how funds are raised and how those funds are used.

The commission proposal thus reflects the view that changes in financial structure have important economic implications and should not be based solely on the issue of equalizing competitive opportunities among financial intermediaries. Changes already underway have had a profound impact on the allocation of savings among the various financial intermediaries, and are affecting in turn the allocation of capital and credit and the composition and level of economic activity.

Historically, government has played an important role in influencing the allocation of credit—through tax and lending programs that give priority to certain borrowing sectors; through regulations that promote specific missions for financial institutions, securities firms in capital formation; thrifts in housing; commercial banks in short-term commercial loans, et cetera, and by prohibiting conflicts of interest and the concentration of financial resources. As changes in financial structure alter the way Government programs and regulations impact on the financial system, the result will not be increased neutrality in the allocation process. Distortions are inevitable and must be addressed.

I believe there is growing support for moratorium legislation. It is becoming more apparent that our financial system is fragile and that a comprehensive examination of the ramifications of changes that have already occurred must be undertaken. The timing of this examination—on the 50th anniversary of so many of our major financial statutes—serves as a reminder of what Congress wanted to accomplish through a number of new pieces of legislation, passed in those Depression years. Banking, thrift, credit union and securities legislation; the establishment of the FDIC, the FSLIC, the SEC and reform of the Federal Reserve System—constituted not only a remarkably successful response to the Depression breakdown, but were a creative blueprint for a new and dynamic financial system that could help America grow again. In a short space of time, public confidence in depository institutions and securities markets was restored and new and better ways of financing housing and consumer credit needs were established.

Regrettably, in some quarters it has become fashionable today to speak of these laws as outmoded. Some of the legislative goals are in disrepute or—worse—are viewed by some as causes of the very problems they were designed to prevent. For example, the effectiveness of deposit and other insurance programs in minimizing risk is viewed by some as an impediment, rather than a contribution, to soundness. Detractors of the FDIC or FSLIC argue that those programs make depositors and investors indifferent to failure and thus inhibit the play of market forces in disciplining unsound financial institutions.

In theory, unchecked market discipline can only work if it permits enough failures to be a real inhibition. But if the number of failures were to rise, the public might begin to wonder if deposit insurance programs offer adequate coverage. Such a loss of confidence could result in bank runs, less capital, less investment, and less economic activity.

I have used the example of bank insurance programs to illustrate the reasoning of the deregulators—those who suggest that deregulation is a goal itself. I could have used other examples. My basic thesis is that instead of viewing our rapidly changing financial system through the lens of deregulation, burdensome government, or stifling bureaucracy, we should start from the traditional public policy goals of customer protection and investor confidence.

The ability of our financial system to meet these basic public policy goals has already been weakened. Signs of increased instability have cropped up in all sectors of the financial services industry. For example:

Forty-two insured banks failed in 1982 and 48 last year—the highest levels since the Depression.

The FDIC recently identified 650 banks as problem institutions, more than twice the level of last year and higher than the previous record of 378 banks in 1976.

Loans not paying interest or principal amount to about half of the aggregate capital of the nine largest banks and may rise higher if the Latin American debt problem worsens.

In 1983, the cost of bank failures was higher than income from the FDIC's annual assessments. These costs were 70 percent of gross annual assessments in 1981 and 1982, compared with a 9-percent annual average from 1934 to 1980.

And in a report to Congress last April, the FDIC suggested that its authority to borrow from the Treasury be increased to reflect its current exposure and "provide a safety valve in the case of a banking crisis."

Meanwhile, there are continuing or new problems in other financial sectors as well. While falling interest rates and legislative and regulatory actions have eased the thrift crisis, neither the FDIC Nor FSLIC believe that the problem is over. It is estimated that thrift insolvencies could cost the FSLIC $2.2 billion in 1984 out of its $7 billion of reserves—up from $1 billion last year. And another sharp, sustained increase in interest rates could further increase pressure on savings banks and deposit insurance reserves.

Crises in the silver market in 1980 and Government securities markets in 1982 revealed how easily a single problem institution can threaten the stability of other financial intermediaries. For example:

Bache had routine interfirm transactions and repurchase agreements with other broker-dealers and banks in excess of $2 billion at the height of the silver crisis.

Between its incorporation in January 1982, and its bankruptcy 4 months later, Drysdale Government Securities had accumulated a gross long position of $2.5 billion and a gross short position of $4 billion with a capital base of $20 million.

It is not just the fact that other firms would have lost money because of Bache and Drysdale's problems. These funds were the equivalent of cash. If they are not there, then somebody else does not get paid. The result is a chain reaction that can only be stopped before it begins. Without Federal Reserve intervention in each of these cases, the failure of these firms could have resulted in a systemic crisis involving broker-dealers, commodities firms and banks.

The insurance industry, too, is confronting major problems. Scandals, losses and the increased risk of failures in the unregulated reinsurance industry are threatening the solvency of regulated insurance companies. The Baldwin-United bankruptcy demonstrates the dangers that conflicts of interest in an unregulated holding company structure pose for customers of financial intermediaries. Neither the regulators nor the industry believe that the State insurance guaranty fund system is adequate to handle current risks.

It is clear to me that if it pursues the goal of seeking only a compromise among financial interest groups as to how the financial pie should now be cut, Congress will not produce a rational structural and regulatory framework for the financial system. And even if it were possible to produce such a compromise, all we would have accomplished would be an allocation of market shares, instead of the most desirable framework to achieve good public policy and restore stability.

What is needed now is an effort to develop a broader consensus on these issues. Without such a consensus, effective action will not be taken. The current focus on expanding the competitive opportunities of intermediaries is far too narrow. Changes in financial structure and regulation will help determine our economic future as they have helped determine our economic development over the past 50 years. If we fail to make a comprehensive examination of the way we structure and regulate financial institutions in this country, we will end up with financial and economic systems that are less fair, less sound and less efficient than the ones we have now.●

JACK SIMMEN'S SERVICE TO AGRICULTURE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay public tribute to John Simmen, who is retiring from 34 years of service to the agricultural industry in California.

As a third-generation Californian who began working on a cattle ranch at age 14, Jack has his roots firmly planted in the traditions of California agriculture. After serving with the Army Air Force during World War II and being decorated several times, Jack received his degree from the University of California at Davis and went to work as an agricultural inspector for the State of California. He served in a number of positions in agricultural enforcement throughout northern California before being appointed agricultural commissioner for Santa Cruz County in 1975, taking on the additional responsibility of county director of weights and measures in 1977.

As a major producer of many of California's specialty crops, Santa Cruz County boasts an agricultural industry which is not only extremely rich and abundant, but unusually diverse as well. Jack has gained an intimate knowledge and familiarity with our local agriculture—knowledge which has helped to guide us over the years in addressing the local industry's needs—and he has provided a truly invaluable service to our farmers. Not content with his service to agriculture, Jack has also contributed immeasurably to the life of Santa Cruz County through his work with the Santa Cruz County farm-a-rama and county fair, his Scouting activities, and most especially his invariable generosity and warmth toward those of us privileged to know him.

I am glad to offer Jack my congratulations and best wishes for his future, as well as my personal thanks for his service. He will indeed be missed.●

SSI PROVISIONS OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. ROYBAL) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, today my colleagues Mr. STARK and Mr. FORD, chairman of the Public Assistance Subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee, have introduced amendments to the SSI program which deserve immediate consideration by the Congress. I appreciate the opportunity which I have had to participate in the development of these amendments and am proud to be an original cosponsor of it.

Some may consider these to be minor and technical amendments. Although it is true that there are many more substantial improvements which should be made, these changes will have substantial impact on those persons affected by them.

I am particularly enthusiastic about the provisions concerning the asset limit. This limit, currently set at $1,500 for an individual has not been raised since the SSI program began in 1973. The result has been that recipients have had to be poorer and poorer to qualify for, and continue to receive SSI payments. Also, by exceeding this limit by however small an amount, and however inadvertently, a recipient can be assessed hundreds of thousands of dollars in overpayments. One of the most important provisions of this bill will raise the limit to $2,000.

Also important is the raising of the $25 allowance to recipients in medicaid facilities to $35 with a cost-of-living increase. This allowance also has not been raised since 1973. Older persons living in nursing homes should have more than the meager $25 a month in spending money, which is less than the allowance many parents give their children.

Again, I want to congratulate Mr. STARK and Mr. FORD for their leadership on these reforms and urge my colleagues to support these changes.●

(p) The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401 (c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $209,000,000 and outlays by $209,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $314,000,000 and outlays by $314,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $446,000,000 and outlays by $446,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(q) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401 (c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $925,000,000 and outlays by $925,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,609,000,000 and outlays by $1,609,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $2,422,000,000 and outlays by $2,422,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 3. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report;

Would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

SECTION 302 (b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 4. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section (401)(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

By Mr. FRENZEL:

—On page 38, line 21, strike everything after the word "years" through page 39, line 16, and insert in lieu thereof "." (a period), and add the following additional subsection:

"(b) In accordance with subsection (a) of this section, the House Committee on the Budget shall report a bill or resolution pursuant to section 310(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 which contains instructions to Committees of the House to make additional changes in laws, bills, or resolutions carrying out all such changes as necessary sufficient to reduce budget authority and outlays for fiscal years 1985, 1986 and 1987, such that the increase in outlays for such fiscal years does not exceed any increase in revenues accruing from current law for such fiscal years.".

By Mr. JONES of Oklahoma:

(Amendment in the nature of a substitute.)

—Strike all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $42,000,000 and outlays by $2,020,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $444,000,000 and outlays by $1,617,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $579,000,000 and outlays by $2,188,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $213,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $162,000,000 in budget authority and $242,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $258,000,000 in budget authority and $222,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws without the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $2,188,000,000 and outlays by $3,023,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $2,714,000,000 and outlays by $3,589,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $3,151,000,000 and outlays by $4,043,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to increase revenues by $9,200,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires increases of $16,700,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1986; and requires increases of $21,300,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1987.

SEC. 2. It is the sense of the Congress that, in order to assure the funding necessary for a strong defense, the House Committee on Armed Services and the House Committee on Appropriations should report to the Congress bills providing authorizations for appropriations and appropriations for defense and defense-related activities for the two-fiscal-year period beginning on October 1, 1984. It is further the sense of the Congress that the House Committee on Rules should report legislation permanently enacting a requirement for a biennial defense budget, or to effect a similar requirement for the Rules of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 3. It is the sense of the Congress that the $4 billion in savings to be achieved from reductions in medicare outlays shall not come from provisions which increase costs to beneficiaries or reduce services provided to beneficiaries. It is further the sense of Congress that a hospital shall not be obligated to obtain signed agreements from each doctor on its medical staff, who provides inpatient services in the hospital, stating that the physician agrees to accept assignment for any medicare beneficiary that he treats as an inpatient of that hospital.

SEC. 4. (a) After the Congress has completed action on the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985, it shall not be in order in either the House of Representatives or the Senate to consider a bill, resolution, or amendment providing authority for—

(1) new direct loan obligations for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new primary loan guarantee commitments for fiscal year 1985; or

(3) new secondary loan guarantee commitments for fiscal year 1985, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(A) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(B) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(C) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report; would cause the appropriate level of total new direct loan obligations for fiscal year 1985, total new primary loan guarantee commitments for such fiscal year, or total new secondary loan guarantee commitments for such fiscal year set forth in such concurrent resolution on the budget to be exceeded.

(b)(1) The joint explanatory statement accompanying the conference report on this resolution shall include an estimated allocation, based upon the first section of this resolution as recommended in such conference report, of the appropriate levels of total new direct loan obligations, new primary loan guarantee commitments, and new secondary loan guarantee commitments authority among each committee of the House of Representatives and the Senate which has jurisdiction over bills and resolutions providing such new authority.

(2) As soon as practicable after this resolution is agreed to every committee of each House, after consulting with the committee or committees of the other House to which the committee or committees of the other House to which all or part of the allocation has been made, subdivide among its subcommittees the allocation of new direct loan obligations, new primary loan guarantee commitments allocated to it in the joint explanatory statement accompanying the conference report on this resolution.

(c) This section shall not be applicable to agricultural price support and related programs of the type in operation on January 1, 1984, that are funded through the Commodity Credit Corporation.

SEC. 5. It is the sense of the Congress that amounts of loans guaranteed, or loan assets sold by a Federal agency, which are financed by the Federal Financing Bank, should be recorded in the unified budget as outlays of the issuing agency. Any budget authority used by the Federal Financing Bank for such transactions shall be attributed to the appropriate Federal agency.

ADMINISTRATIVE SAVINGS

SEC. 6. It is the sense of the Congress that the Executive Branch achieve at least $28 billion in savings over fiscal years 1985 through 1987 by implementing those recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control requiring administrative action within that branch of Government. It is further the sense of the Congress that the President shall report to Congress each year, in conjunction with the annual budget submission, on the progress made in achieving the savings required by this section.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 7. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act.

SECTION 302(b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 8. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

Within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

By Mr. McHUGH:

—Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than May 1, 1984, the House committees named in subsections (b) through (i)(1) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the House Budget Committee. After receiving those recommendations, the Committee on the Budget shall report to the House a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

(b) The House Committee on Agriculture shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $50,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $800,000,000 and outlays by $800,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,700,000,000 and outlays by $1,700,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(c) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $300,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $650,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(d) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(e) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,350,000,000 and outlays by $1,350,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,650,000,000 and outlays by $1,650,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $550,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $1,300,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,800,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $150,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $250,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $150,000,000 and outlays by $400,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $250,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i)(1) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,400,000,000 and outlays by $1,400,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,750,000,000 and outlays by $1,750,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(2) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to increase revenues by $14,300,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires increases of $27,300,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1986; and requires increases of $34,600,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1987.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 3. (a) For fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, any revenues raised by legislation enacted on or after March 15, 1984, shall only be used to reduce the Federal budget deficits for such fiscal years except to the extent that such legislation earmarks all or any part of such revenues for specific spending programs.

(b) Pursuant to subsection (a) of this section and notwithstanding the spending levels contained in section 1 of this resolution, funding for specific low-income programs, such as—

(1) an employment initiative for disadvantaged youth;

(2) public works jobs for community renewal;

(3) increased funding for the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program and the State component of the Supplemental Security Income program to ensure that the purchasing power of recipients is maintained;

(4) increased funding for title XX of the Social Security Act; and

(5) an increase in the earned income tax credit;

would be appropriate if the authorizations for such programs are enacted and if sufficient revenues or outlay reductions are also enacted to ensure that the legislation is deficit neutral.

ADMINISTRATIVE SAVINGS

SEC. 4. It is the sense of the Congress that the Executive Branch achieve at least $2 billion in savings over fiscal years 1985 through 1987 by implementing those recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control requiring administrative action within that branch of Government. It is further the sense of the Congress that the President shall report to Congress each year, in conjunction with the annual budget submission, on the progress made in achieving the savings required by this section.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 5. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report;

would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

"PAY AS YOU GO" TRUST FUND AMENDMENT

SEC. 6. (a) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report shall be disregarded if the budget authority for outlays which will result from such new discretionary budget authority or such new spending authority is derived from any trust fund—

(1) the expenditures from which are available for highway, masss transit, or aviation purposes;

(2) for which new or expanded user fees or taxes were enacted during the 97th Congress; and

(3) which is described in section 401(d)(1)(B) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Act of 1974.

(b) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds it section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget athority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report to fund programs under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 shall be disregarded to the extent that such bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report contains revenue sufficient to cover such new spending, or to the extent that sufficient revenue to cover such increases is included in the Comprehensive Evironmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980.

SECTION 302 (b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 7. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

By Mr. MACKAY:

—Strike all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

(a) The following budgetary levels are appropriate for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1983, October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, and October 1, 1986:

(1) The recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1984: $664,900,000,000.

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than May 1, 1984, the House committees named in subsections (b) through (i)(1) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the House Budget Committee. After receiving those recommendations, the Committee on the Budget shall report to the House a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

(b) The House Committee on Agriculture shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $50,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $800,000,000 and outlays by $800,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,700,000,000 and outlays by $1,700,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(c) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $300,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $650,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(d) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(e) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,350,000,000 and outlays by $1,350,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,650,000,000 and outlays by $1,650,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $550,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $1,300,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,800,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $150,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $250,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $150,000,000 and outlays by $400,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $250,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i)(1) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,400,000,000 and outlays by $1,400,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,750,000,000 and outlays by $1,750,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(2) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to increase revenues by $9,200,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires increases of $16,700,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1986; and requires increases of $21,300,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1987.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 3. (a) For fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, any revenues raised by legislation enacted on or after March 15, 1984, shall only be used to reduce the Federal budget deficits for such fiscal years except to the extent that such legislation earmarks all or any part of such revenues for specific spending programs.

(b) Pursuant to subsection (a) of this section and notwithstanding the spending levels contained in section 1 of this resolution, funding for specific low-income programs, such as—

(1) an employment initiative for disadvantaged youth;

(2) public works jobs for community renewal;

(3) increased funding for the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program and the State component of the Supplemental Security Income program to ensure that the purchasing power of recipients is maintained;

(4) increased funding for title XX of the Social Security Act; and

(5) an increase in the earned income tax credit;

would be appropriate if the authorizations for such programs are enacted and if sufficient revenues or outlay reductions are also enacted to ensure that the legislation is deficit neutral.

ADMINISTRATIVE SAVINGS

SEC. 4. It is the sense of the Congress that the Executive Branch achieve at least $2 billion in savings over fiscal years 1985 through 1987 by implementing those recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control requiring administrative action within that branch of Government. It is further the sense of the Congress that the President shall report to Congress each year, in conjunction with the annual budget submission, on the progress made in achieving the savings required by this section.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 5. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report;

would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The Provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

"PAY AS YOU GO" TRUST FUND AMENDMENT

SEC. 6. (a) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1, of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report shall be disregarded if the budget authority for outlays which will result from such new discretionary budget authority or such new spending authority is derived from any trust fund—

(1) the expenditures from which are available for highway, mass transit, or aviation purposes;

(2) for which new or expanded user fees or taxes were enacted during the 97th Congress; and

(3) which is described in section 401(d)(1)(B) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Act of 1974.

(b) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report to fund programs under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 shall be disregarded to the extent that such bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report contains revenue sufficient to cover such new spending, or to the extent that sufficient revenue to cover such increases is included in the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980.

SECTION 302(b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 7. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

By Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut:

—Strike all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than May 1, 1984, the House committees named in subsection (b) through (i)(1) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the House Budget Committee. After receiving those recommendations, the Committee on the Budget shall report to the House a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

(b) The House Committee on Agriculture shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $50,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $800,000,000 and outlays by $800,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,700,000,000 and outlays by $1,700,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(c) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $300,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $650,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(d) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $150,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(e) The House Committee on Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,350,000,000 and outlays by $1,350,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,650,000,000 and outlays by $1,650,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $550,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $1,300,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,800,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on Small Business shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $200,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $150,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $250,000,000 in budget authority and $200,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee on Veterans' Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $150,000,000 and outlays by $400,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $50,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $250,000,000 and outlays by $250,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i)(1) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $1,000,000,000 and outlays by $1,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $1,400,000,000 and outlays by $1,400,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $1,750,000,000 and outlays by $1,750,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(2) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to increase revenues by $12,500,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires increases of $36,400,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1986; and requires increases of $64,400,000,000 in revenues in fiscal year 1987.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 3. (a) For fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, any revenues raised by legislation enacted on or after March 15, 1984, shall only be used to reduce the Federal budget deficits for such fiscal years except to the extent that such legislation earmarks all or any part of such revenues for specific spending programs.

(b) Pursuant to subsection (a) of this section and notwithstanding the spending levels contained in section 1 of this resolution, funding for specific low-income programs, such as—

(1) an employment initiative for disadvantaged youth;

(2) public works jobs for community renewal;

(3) increased funding for the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program and the State component of the Supplemental Security Income program to ensure that the purchasing power of recipients is maintained;

(4) increased funding for title XX of the Social Security Act; and

(5) an increase in the earned income tax credit;

would be appropriate if the authorizations for such programs are enacted and if sufficient revenues or outlay reductions are also enacted to ensure that the legislation is deficit neutral.

ADMINISTRATIVE SAVINGS

SEC. 4. It is the sense of the Congress that the Executive Branch achieve at least $2 billion in savings over fiscal years 1985 through 1987 by implementing those recommendations of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control requiring administrative action within that branch of Government. It is further the sense of the Congress that the President shall report to Congress each year, in conjunction with the annual budget submission, on the progress made in achieving the savings required by this section.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 5. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report;

would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

"PAY AS YOU GO" TRUST FUND AMENDMENT

SEC. 6. (a) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report shall be disregarded if the budget authority for outlays which will result from such new discretionary budget authority or such new spending authority is derived from any trust fund—

(1) the expenditures from which are available for highway, mass transit, or aviation purposes;

(2) for which new or expanded user fees or taxes were enacted during the 97th Congress; and

(3) which is described in section 401(d)(1)(B) of the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Act of 1974.

(b) For purposes of the spending levels for fiscal year 1985 contained in section 1 of this resolution, and the assumptions upon which they are based, and for purposes of determining whether or not a committee exceeds its section 302(a) allocation of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority for the prohibition contained in section 5 of this resolution, any new discretionary budget authority contained in a bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report to fund programs under the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation, and Liability Act of 1980 shall be disregarded to the extent that such bill, resolution, amendment, or conference report contains revenue sufficient to cover such new spending, or to the extent that sufficient revenue to cover such increases is included in the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980.

SECTION 302(b) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 7. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

By Mr. ROEMER:

—Strike out all after the resolving clause of H. Con. Res. 280 and insert:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1984 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 are hereby set forth:

RECONCILIATION

SEC. 2. (a) Not later than May 1, 1984, the House committees named in subsections (b) through (i)(1) of this section shall submit their recommendations to the House Budget Committee. After receiving those recommendations, the Committee on the Budget shall report to the House a reconciliation bill or resolution or both carrying out all such recommendations without any substantive revision.

(c) The House Committee on Armed Services shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, Sufficient to reduce outlays by $423,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $767,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,170,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(d) The House Committee on Education and Labor shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, Sufficient to reduce outlays by $2,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $6,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $9,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(e) The House Committee On Energy and Commerce shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $2,000,00 and outlays by $71,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $3,000,000 and outlays by $168,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $5,000,000 and outlays by $272,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(f) The House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $523,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $1,061,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $1,563,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(g) The House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee sufficient to reduce outlays by $8,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of $16,000,000 in budget authority and $16,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of $24,000,000 in budget authority and $24,000,000 in outlays in fiscal year 1987.

(h) The House Committee Foreign Affairs shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce budget authority by $2,000,000 and outlays by $5,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of budget authority by $4,000,000 and outlays by $10,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of budget authority by $6,000,000 and outlays by $16,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

(i)(1) The House Committee on Ways and Means shall report changes in laws within the jurisdiction of that committee which provide spending authority as defined in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, sufficient to reduce outlays by $3,655,000,000 in fiscal year 1985; further the Congress finds that to attain the policy of this resolution in future years requires decreases of outlays by $7,418,000,000 in fiscal year 1986; and requires decreases of outlays by $11,769,000,000 in fiscal year 1987.

SEC. 5. (a) If Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1984, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for the 1985 fiscal year, then this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) of such Act, for the purposes of the prohibitions contained in section 311 of such Act, notwithstanding congressional action or inaction on any reconciliation requirements contained in this concurrent resolution.

(b) Section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported;

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; or

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report;

would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1985 to be exceeded.

(c) The provisions of this section shall cease to apply when Congress completes action on a subsequent concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 pursuant to section 304 or 310 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974.

SECTION 302(B) FILING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 7. (a) It shall not be in order in the House of Representatives to consider any bill or resolution, or amendment thereto, providing—

(1) new budget authority for fiscal year 1985;

(2) new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act first effective in fiscal year 1985; or

(3) direct loan authority, primary loan guarantee authority, or secondary loan guarantee authority for fiscal year 1985;

within the jurisdiction of any committee which has received an allocation pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of discretionary budget authority or new spending authority, as described above, for such fiscal year, unless and until such committee makes the allocation or subdivisions required by section 302(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, in connection with the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the budget.

(b) The prohibition contained in subsection (a) shall not apply until twenty-one days of continuous session, as defined in section 1011(5) of the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, after Congress completes action on this concurrent resolution.

COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS

The COLA=C.P.I. minus 2 provisions of this budget do not affect the "means-tested" entitlements (SSI, AFDC, Medicaid, food stamps, school lunch, WIC and Pell grants) or Veterans Compensation and Veterans Pensions.

Medicare is affected only to the extent of $4 billion in reductions over three years (1985, $1.0 billion; 1986, $1.4 billion; and 1987, $1.6 billion.)

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

NATIONAL OUTDOOR RECREATION RESOURCES REVIEW COMMISSION II

HON. JOHN F. SEIBERLING
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, the Interior Commmittee's Subcommittee on Public Lands and National Parks will soon begin hearings on proposals to establish a new, high-level commission to review how the Federal, State, and local governments are now responding to the American people's interest in outdoor recreation.

Specifically, we will be looking at two bills, H.R. 2837 and S. 1090, which would establish a National Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission mandated to make recommendations aimed at assuring the continued availability of quality outdoor recreation experiences in America to the year 2000.

The new Commission would be parallel to the composition and mandate of the pioneering Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission (ORRRC) which was established in 1958 and which issued its report in 1962.

The ORRRC report of 1962 was an important landmark in the history of Federal policymaking. We in the Congress are still heavily involved in implementing the ORRRC recommendations in such ways as designation of new wilderness areas and national parks; allocations of funds from the land and water conservation fund; designations of new wild and scenic rivers; designation of scenic and historic trails; and assistance to the States and local governments through the land and water conservation fund so they can respond to the need for quality outdoor recreation opportunities.

The ORRRC recommendations of 1962 also laid the foundation for many of the most important laws and policies now in place for management and protection of parks and public lands, historic and cultural resources, fish and wildlife habitat, wilderness, and other resources and values.

The original Commission concept can be traced to a series of public concerns that emerged in the mid-1950's. These included burgeoning visitation to Federal and State parks poorly equipped to accommodate heavy use, a growing interest in the protection of scenic areas in the face of expanding urban growth, the loss of hunting and fishing opportunities in the countryside, and an awareness of deteriorating air and water quality in the Nation as a whole. These concerns found expression in the legislation which created the commission and in other statutes which gave life to the Commission's recommendations.

At the conclusion of an exhaustive 3-year study, the 1962 report stated that although outdoor recreation was a major leisure time activity bringing individual satisfaction and national economic benefits, there were serious deficiencies in the Nation's supply of outdoor recreation opportunities. The three major findings were:

Outdoor recreation opportunities were most urgently needed near metropolitan areas.

Although considerable land was available for outdoor recreation, it did not effectively meet the need.

To meet the need for outdoor recreation, additional funding was required at the Federal, State, and local levels.

The recommendations of ORRRC were implemented through actions by the Congress and succeeding administrations. These included: The Land and Water Conservation Fund Act (LWCF) of 1964, through which offshore oil revenues came to be used, along with some other receipts, to acquire and develop local, State, and Federal parkland; legislation establishing national systems of wilderness, rivers, and trails; the transfer of Federal surplus land to States and localities for park and recreation purposes; and the establishment of Federal, State, and local recreation areas in or near heavily populated urban centers.

The report of the Commission guided national outdoor recreation policy for two decades. Unfortunately, under the direction of the current administration:

Land and water conservation fund requests have been reduced to near zero levels.

Significant land resources which had been designated for wilderness study by the Bureau of Land Management have been removed from consideration by the Department of the Interior.

National park units near urban areas, established as an outgrowth of the ORRRC study, have come under increasing attack by the Department of the Interior resulting in reduced funds for land acquisition, reduced staff, and declining services to the public.

The Heritage and Conservation Service (recommended by the ORRRC study as the Bureau of Outdoor Recreation) was abolished by the administration.

Numbers bills to establish wilderness areas within units of the national park system and the national forests have been passed by the House only to flounder in the other body, in part because of opposition by this administration.

Mr. Speaker, when we consider the many changes that have taken place in our society since 1962, there may be merit to the idea of establishing a new nonpartisan ORRRC Commission to review the actions taken on the recommendations of the 1962 report and to make further recommendations on those matters and on new developments relating to outdoor recreation. However, I think it is important to recognize that there is still a considerable way to go to achieve the goals formulated by the original ORRRC in 1962 and subsequently adopted by the Congress in general legislation.

Appointing another Commission is no substitute for substantive action in support of outdoor recreation for all Americans. It is sad but true that when this administration came to office, it immediately began a campaign to reverse the thrust of the original Commission's program. This campaign included proposals to deauthorize seven national urban recreation areas, to impose a 5-year moratorium on new land acquisition by the national park system, do divert land and water conservation money from land acquisition to other uses, to abolish the Youth Conservation Corps, to reduce to zero grants from the fund to the States for acquiring recreation land, to drop wilderness study areas, and to open up wilderness areas to oil and gas exploration and development. At the same time, the administration has opposed most of the major pieces of wilderness legislation approved by the House. They have also opposed related legislation such as the American Conservation Corps and national park protection bills.

Of course, there is still time, before the end of this session of Congress, for the administration to reverse its negative approach and to support a constructive resolution of the many wilderness and outdoor recreation-related issues pending in Congress. But time is running out. Before the House gives the President and the Senate the opportunity, between them, to appoint a majority of the members of a new ORRRC, the House ought to insist on significant support for these substantive pieces of legislation as a demonstration of practical commitment to outdoor recreation and, in particular, to the protection of key outdoor recreation resources.

I hope Members of the House will consider the situation I have outlined before committing themselves to a position on the proposed ORRRC.●

WHAT PRICE HOME TAPING?

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, this past January, the Supreme Court handed down its long awaited decision in the Betamax case. Despite the Court's reversal of the ninth circuit decision which had found the manufacturers of video cassette recorders liable for contributory copyright infringement, it is significant that all nine justices—both the five constituting the majority and the four who dissented—felt the issue of home recording and its implications for copyright was one that could best be addressed by the Congress.

The Court's decision was based on evidence from 1978 when the number of home video recorders was 800,000. Had the Court considered the rapid increase in the number of home recorders, now estimated at 10 million with up to 7 million more predicted to be sold this year, and the implications this burgeoning number of VCR's has for the health of the entertainment industry, its decision may well have been a different one.

Other factors have also changed significantly since the Betamax case was originally heard. New technology has produced new kinds of video cassette recorders which facilitate commercial deletion. Increasingly, advertisers are balking at paying for ads that are never viewed. An entire market for the sale and rental of prerecorded cassettes exists now that was simply not present in 1978.

A recent editorial in the New York Times examines some of these factors, and concludes that some sort of royalty arrangement to compensate the movie and recording industry for losses associated with home recording is necessary. I feel strongly that Congress must eventually address this issue. The editorial provides useful information for that task, and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues.

The editorial follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 30, 1984]

WHAT PRICE HOME TAPING?

Inexpensive recorders and blank tapes now allow anyone to preserve a rare old Mozart recording without buying a new one, or to copy a Eurythmics album borrowed from a friend, or to collect Mary Tyler Moore shows snatched from the air. But the technology that gives consumers such pleasure is eroding the income of the producers of these entertainments—the studios, writers, violinists and drummers who depend on royalties from each performance or recording sale. And they are pressing Congress for compensation.

Unlicensed home recording of their copyrighted work may not now be a mortal threat to the entertainment business. But there is nonetheless a good argument for giving copyright holders some income from home recording. And there is at least an imperfect way to do it.

The owners of music, film and TV shows have long asked for royalties from a fund built by a kind of tax on the sales of recording equipment and blank tape. But Hollywood producers failed to persuade the Supreme Court this year that they had suffered enough injury to permit the Court, rather than Congress, to impose such a tax. That "Betamax" decision was based on evidence from the late 1970's, when relatively few homes had video recorders. Claims of greater damage now are likely to be pressed in court if Congress fails to act.

The pending legislative proposals deal with both audio and video recording. But the damage to the music industry is more easily demonstrated. Surveys show that five of every six home recordings are appropriating copyrighted music. And Alan Greenspan, an industry consultant, estimates that 40 percent of these represent lost sales and lost royalties for performers and composers.

Whether home video taping does much economic harm is not yet equally clear. Surely many home viewers are only watching shows or films at a more convenient time and could be added to the Nielsen-counted regular audiences. But surveys indicate that many of these viewers "fast-forward" their tapes through the commercials and are thus lost to the advertisers who pay for the programming. And at least a third of home video recordings are of movies that can be passed from home to home, thus reducing the markets for commercial tapes of film, repeat showings on the air and pay-per-view cable presentations.

A common argument against any royalty fee for home recording is that the entertainment business is rich enough to afford the loss. But most recordings of music and the artists who make them are not commercially successful. Home audio recordings surely damage the industry, particularly its classical music branch. In movies, too, any technology that diminishes the paying audience will have the effect of favoring mass tastes and diminishing the choice for minority audiences.

The entertainment industries propose a system of negotiated royalties on the sales of hardware and blank tapes, backed by arbitration. Such a system has long been used to collect royalties from radio stations that play copyrighted music over the air.

There remain many questions about how the royalties would be distributed to make sure that the most often "appropriated" works get a fair subsidy. But if a royalty charge can be worked out, it would promote diversity in performances and thus benefit the entertained as well as the entertainers.●

BULLETPROOF VESTS DO THE JOB AGAINST "MOST" BULLETS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, Du Pont, the company that makes a bullet-resistant fiber called Kevlar, estimates that approximately 600,000 bulletproof vests have been made in this country since 1973. These vests are comfortable—weighing only about 3 pounds—and, more importantly, they can stop the conventional handgun ammunition used by most criminals.

In fact, Du Pont informs me that—

There have been between 500 and 600 documented reports of law enforcement officers who have been saved from death or serious personal injury by wearing vests made with "Kevlar." This estimate is probably conservative in that there is no established procedure to insure that all "saves" are actually reported.

Currently, more than half of our Nation's 528,000 law enforcement officers wear bullet resistant body armor on a daily basis. The U.S. Justice Department reports that more than 400 police lives have been saved by these vests. In fact, during the 10 years, 1974-83, that bulletproof vests have been used, handgun-related police deaths have declined by 43 percent—93 in 1974 to 53 in 1983.

Our newspapers tell the story. For instance, on December 1, 1982, Washington Post readers were told in graphic detail just how effective bulletproof vests can be:

William Johnson struggled for the .357 magnum revolver held only inches from his chest. He watched the gun as it fired seconds later. He saw his shirt tear as the bullet struck. He felt its crushing force. And because the 62-year-old Alexandria deputy sheriff was wearing a bulletproof vest, he was alive yesterday to help convict the man accused of trying to kill him.

Although not designed to stop rifle ammunition, the 18-layer Kevlar vest most commonly worn by police officers will stop the conventional handgun bullets used by criminals. As a result, more and more police are looking to soft body armor for protection. Just last year, in fact, I joined in the effort to raise $624,000 to furnish more than 3,000 District of Columbia police officers with a bulletproof vest.

Yet, despite its ability to stop conventional handgun ammunition, soft body armor is totally useless against a small class of handgun bullets specially made for maximum penetration. For example, the Teflon-coated KTW bullet, which is generally regarded as the most powerful of these armor-piercing bullets, can penetrate the equivalent of four bulletproof vests—72 layers of Kevlar—in a single shot. Significantly, these high-powered projectiles are not used for any legitimate purposes, but they have been used by criminals.

As a 23-year veteran of the New York City Police Department and one who was wounded 10 times in the line of duty, I was asked by the law enforcement community to author legislation that would outlaw these so-called cop killer bullets. My bill, H.R. 953, would ban the future manufacture, importation, and sale of the approximately eight different armor-piercing handgun bullets that now exist, and would prevent any new ones from being developed.

In addition, this legislation would also impose a mandatory, 1- to 10-year prison sentence on any person that uses such ammunition in a crime. My distinguished colleague from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, has also introduced an identical bill, S. 555, in the Senate.

While there have been hearings in both the House and Senate on this legislation over the past 2 years, the two measures remain stalled in committee. One of the major reasons for this delay: An unreasonable, yet fierce campaign against any ban on "cop killer" bullets being waged by the National Rifle Association. Their rationale has varied, but most recently they told a Senate Subcommittee that since "there has been no rash of criminal misuse of armor-piercing handgun ammunition. * * * there is no demonstrated need for this legislation."

Frankly, I believe it is better to prevent police deaths than respond to them. That is why I authorized the Law Enforcement Officers Protection Act and based on the overwhelming bipartisan support this legislation has received, I am confident it is only a matter at time before a Federal ban is enacted against "cop killer" bullets.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I wish to insert a recent article that appeared in the New York Post, which helps to illustrate why bulletproof vests are so important to police, and why we must do everything possible to keep armor-piercing handgun bullets away from criminals. The article, written by Jack Peritz and Paul Tharp, begins:

A gunman was riddled in a blazing shootout in a Harlem schoolyard yesterday that left one cop wounded and another thanking God for his bulletproof vest. . . .

TWO COPS WOUNDED IN SCHOOLYARD GUN DUEL

(By Jack Peritz and Paul Tharp)

A gunman was riddled in a blazing shootout in a Harlem schoolyard yesterday that left one cop wounded and another thanking God for his bullet-proof vest.

From his hospital room, a housing cop who received only a bruise after being shot in the chest at near point-blank range recalled his promise to his mother never to take off his bullet-proof vest.

"Thank God for the vest," said Officer John Leho, 29.

"Mother made my brother—he's a cop in the 48th Precinct in The Bronx—and I make a pact that no matter how hot it got we would always wear the vest."

Leho and two fellow housing officers—one who was wounded—were involved in the shootout that erupted at 2:25 p.m.

Just minutes earlier an off-duty cop spotted a man with a gun in his waistband walking through the playground outside PS 194 at 8th Ave. and 143d St., Harlem.

William Martinez, assigned to the 46th Precinct in The Bronx, ran around the corner to Housing Police headquarters in the Drew Hamilton housing project.

Three cops—Leho, John Bailey and John Washington—were dispatched to the crowded playground

As they approached Daryl Jones, 21, of Linden New Jersey, he whipped out a long-barreled .22-caliber revolver and began shooting, police said.

One shot ripped into Leho's bullet-proof vest, stunning him momentarily before he managed to empty his gun.

Washington was sent sprawling with a bullet in his foot, but he too emptied his gun.

Bailey blasted off two shots at Jones, police said.

Jones was hit in the wrist, shoulder and chest.

He was taken to Harlem Hospital in critical condition.

Mayor Koch, who with Police Commissioner Benjamin Ward rushed to visit the cops at Columbia Presbyterian Medical Center, said, "I am fortunate to be able to talk with the officers involved Thank God."

He asked Washington why he wasn't wearing his bullet-proof socks.

"I hadn't heard about those," the wounded officer laughed.

Bailey, slated to retire in two months after 20 years on the force, said he was too shaken to talk.

Koch said yesterday was the first time Bailey had not worn his vest.

"I made him raise his hand and swear to me he would never go on duty without the vest," the mayor said.

Ward also said that two hours before the shooting a man drove past the 28th Precinct at 2271 8th Ave. and fired two shots at cops.

They chased Alessandro Penna, 30, a known cocaine dealer, up to 125th St. where he stopped his car, pulled out a .357 Magnum and killed himself.●

SSI EQUITABLE IMPROVEMENTS AND REFORM AMENDMENTS OF 1984

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself, Mr. FORD of Tennessee, Mr. FOWLER, Mr. MATSUI, and Mrs. KENNELLY, I am today introducing the Supplemental Security Income—SSI—Equitable Improvements and Reform Amendments of 1984. I am also pleased to announce that Senator Moynihan will be introducing the same bill on the Senate side. This legislation will make the SSI program more manageable, more effective and better able to serve the needy aged, blind, and disabled. A major goal of this bill is to improve the present unrealistic standards and administration of the program that now impede the efficacy, access and above all fairness of the SSI program.

On the 10th anniversary of the SSI program, it seems appropriate to compare the program's performance with its original goals and expectations. SSI began in January 1974 as a federally funded means tested income assistance program authorized by title XVI of the Social Security Act. It is 100 percent federally funded. Its main objective is to provide basic support to needy aged, blind and disabled individuals who meet nationwide eligibility requirements.

Unfortuately, Mr. Speaker, as former chairman of the Public Assistance and Unemployment Compensation Subcommittee, and now ranking member, I have watched the SSI program in the past few years become needlessly complex and rigid and have seen negative, unintended consequences of current law hinder the original objectives. Likewise, certain provisions have not kept pace with inflation. My bill does not propose comprehensive welfare reform, although that certainly would be a worthy goal. Nor does it try to correct all of the inequities in the program. Instead, it takes incremental—but no less important—steps toward a fairer, more responsive, and more manageable SSI program. These are steps I believe we must take if we are interested in reducing the "meanness factor" which has crept into the program for present beneficiaries. Also, the resource limits need to be adjusted so that truly needy aged, blind, and disabled individuals will become eligible. My legislation contains several proposals that lead us in this direction.

First, it would correct some unfair consequences of current SSI law by not counting gifts or small inheritances as income in a month, if in the following month they would be excluded as resources. Present law inhibits the normal kind of gift giving and inheritance practices between family members and friends. When the Social Security Administration learns of these gifts and inherited items, it counts them as income which results in the reduction of benefits for the month, even though the items will not be converted into cash and will become excluded resources the following month. This has been an extremely harsh provision which has unfairly reduced benefits even though the person could not use the item in question to meet normal living expenses.

This bill would correct another unfair consequence of current law by allowing SSI recipients who receive large retroactive SSI or social security checks a full year to spend this money before making them ineligible for SSI. Presently they must spend the underpayment money in 4 months, even if it makes more sense to wait a longer period of time before spending the sum. Further, the legislation eliminates the requirement that temporary income received in the initial month of eligibility for SSI be counted more than once in retrospective budgeting. Under retrospective budgeting this initial temporary assistance is counted three times (that is, in the initial month and then in the third and fourth months) even though the money is not available to the recipient. The provision would prohibit such duplicate counting.

Other provisions of my bill would make the SSI program simpler and less expensive to administer, while also improving benefits to recipients. For example, this legislation would make permanent provisions which exclude from income certain emergency and other inkind assistance and make permanent the exclusion of energy assistance provided by private nonprofit organizations on the basis of need. These provisions will expire June 30, 1985. Without the permanent extension, privately furnished assistance will again be counted as income even though State-funded identical assistance is excluded. Administratively this makes no sense and certainly discourages private efforts to provide assistance to SSI recipients and negates the effect of the private program. Further, interest and dividend income would not be counted in determining the income of an SSI recipient. Interest and dividend income for an SSI recipient is limited to what can be earned on resources within the limits of the SSI program ($1,500 for individuals and $2,250 for couples). The interest income, almost always under $10 a month, frequently puts people over the assets limits and they are thrown off the rolls. Administratively it is very costly to take people off the rolls and then put them back on when they have spent the interest income. Needless to say it is a tremendous hardship for these people to lose their entire SSI benefits because of the small interest income they have received. Another provision that would produce administrative savings is my proposal to exclude the total value of one car from the SSI assets test. The administration's SSI Regulations Simplification Task Force, found that excluding a first vehicle entirely from the assets computation would save no program cost and would save administrative costs.

Further, there are proposals to make the SSI guidelines more reasonable and flexible in dealing with recipients who have received overpayments. Presently the Social Security Administration is allowed to withhold the entire benefit check to recoup an overpayment it has erroneously made. To make the recoupment of overpayments more reasonable, my proposal limits decreasing SSI payments by no more than the greater of $10 or 10 percent of the benefit check. The bill will also limit recoupment of overpayments to the actual amount overpaid. Current law provides that a recipient is no longer eligible for SSI benefits when the $1,500 or $2,250 asset limit is exceeded, and that the entire SSI benefit check is to be considered an overpayment. By limiting the definition of overpayment to the actual amount that the benefit check exceeds the assets limit, people will not lose their entire benefit check when they exceed the assets limit by small amounts. Also current law allows the Social Security Administration to reduce an overpayment by the amount of any underpayment without giving the individual a chance to question the overpayment. My legislation provides that where an individual has been both underpaid and overpaid, no adjustment will be made against the underpayment until the individual has had an opportunity to seek waiver of the overpayment.

There are also provisions to make the determination of SSI benefit amounts fairer. It is estimated that some $70 million in underpayments were made as a result of the current law's one-third reduction formula applied to those initial applicants who have no income and live in another person's home. Once these people receive their first check they can pay for their support, which means that the next several SSI checks, before a readjustment is made, are less than the amount due them. The bill provides that for this category of people (that is, applicants without any income) the SSI reduction will be based on a determination of the value of support and maintenance provided. Another provision of current law requires that residents of medicaid facilities have their SSI benefits reduced to $25 a month after 1 month in the facility. This has forced people to give up their independent living arrangements and has increased the likelihood that recipients will remain in the institution for lack of an alternative. By continuing full benefits through the second month of institutionalization, this legislation reduces the number of people who will have to live out their lives in medicaid facilities.

My bill expands eligibility to truly deserving individuals who presently do not qualify for SSI. Disabled children of military servicemen and others transferred to duty out of the country would be eligible for SSI under this legislation as long as the individual's parents retain their legal residence in a State. So too, the bill reduces from 6 months to 1 month the time that an SSI individual and their eligible spouse must be living apart before they will be treated as individuals for determining eligibility for SSI benefits.

Equally important, the legislation allows several categories of disabled SSI recipients to retain their SSI and medicaid rather than being forced to accept social security or railroad retirement benefits and then have to wait 3 or 4 years to become eligible for medicare.

Updating certain resource limits and benefit standards are other important provisions of this bill which will further the goal of aiding the truly needy. The assets limitations of $1,500 for individuals and $2,250 for couples have not been changed since 1974, even though the CPI has increased by 119 percent. The administration has proposed increasing the food stamp resource limit to $2,250 and $3,500 for individuals and couples respectively. My legislation proposes an even more modest increase in the assets limits for individuals to $2,000 and $3,000 for couples. This will allow many more elderly people who are truly poor qualify for SSI. Likewise the personal needs allowance for SSI recipients in medicaid facilities has remained $25 a month since 1974. This works out to 83 cents a day. My modest proposal would increase this amount to $35 a month and would annually increase it by a cost-of-living adjustment as other SSI benefits are adjusted.

The SSI program was instituted to replace the much criticized old-age assistance, aid to blind and aid to the permanently disabled Federal matching grant programs in the States. My legislation would also replace these same programs in Guam and the Virgin Islands and grant SSI benefits to these people. A study of the feasibility of extending SSI to Puerto Rico is another proposal.

Lastly, this legislation seeks to provide better Outreach and assistance to applicants and recipients of SSI. Because the actual and potential SSI population is made up of less literate aged, the blind, and mentally ill and retarded individuals, special efforts need to be made in order that these people hear about the program and come to realize the benefits available to them. The written notices also need to be rewritten in order to make them more understandable to this population. For example, one judge has commented that the notices sent to disabled SSI recipients were difficult for him to understand.

Taken together these proposals will, in my estimation, make the SSI program fairer for recipients, easier for them to understand, more responsive to the truly needy aged, blind and disabled, and simpler and cheaper to administer. These are goals which I believe all of my colleagues can support. I am pleased to announce that the Save Our Security Coalition (SOS), made up over 100 national organizations and 100 local groups, is supporting this SSI legislation. The following summary includes those proposals discussed above and others that are self-explanatory.

SUMMARY OF SSI EQUITABLE IMPROVEMENT AND REFORM AMENDMENTS OF 1984

TITLE I—TREATMENT OF INCOME

Section 101. Excludes certain gifts from income, e.g., property received which in the following month would be excluded as a resource or a gift which is not converted into cash.

Section 102. Makes permanent provisions which exclude from income certain emergency and other in-kind assistance provided on the basis of need by non-profit organizations and makes permanent the exclusion of home energy assistance provided by private organizations on the basis of need.

Section 103. Interest and dividend income on countable resources that are within the resource limits would not be counted as income.

Section 104. Requires that temporary one-time income received in the initial month of eligibility for SSI is not counted more than once under the retrospective budgeting process.

Section 105. Excludes from income reparations received from the West German government by holocaust survivors.

TITLE II—TREATMENT OF RESOURCES

Section 201. Establishes certain limits on the amount of overpayments incurred when it is found that an SSI recipient's resources had in a previous month exceeded the allowable limit by an amount less than the individual's SSI payment.

Section 202. Provides that in the SSI program, as in the Medicaid program, that when resources are transferred at less than fair market value to qualify for benefits, that the length of delay in eligibility for benefits would be in proportion to the uncompensated value of such resource instead of current SSI law's penalty of no less than a two year delay in eligibility.

Section 203. Excludes from being counted as a resource for 12 months for SSI eligibility purposes the value of retroactive SSI or social security checks.

Section 204. Increases the SSI countable resources limit from $1500 to $2000 for an individual and from $2250 to $3000 for a couple.

Section 205. Provides for exempting from the SSI resources limit the applicant's or recipient's automobile instead of current law which provides for the Secretary to periodically adjust the allowable limit on the amount of the value of a car which is exempt from the resources limit. (Current law also exempts the applicant's or recipient's home in contrast to the original SSI law under which the Secretary had authority to set a value limit on the home.)

TITLE III—DETERMINATION OF BENEFIT AMOUNTS

Section 301. Modifies the assumptions to be used in determining whether or not an SSI applicant is receiving in-kind assistance when living with others in such a way as to protect SSI applicants from an automatic ⅓ reduction in their initial SSI benefit if at the time of application they are living with a relatively low income household.

Section 302. Instead of residents of Medicaid facilities having their SSI benefits reduced to $25 a month (as adjusted by Section 303) effective the first full month in such a facility, they would not have their SSI benefit standard reduced until the second full month in such a facility.

Section 303. The current $25 a month SSI benefit standard for residents of Medicaid facilities would be increased to $35 and would be annually increased by the same cost of living percentage as other SSI benefit standards.

TITLE IV—PROVISIONS RELATING TO ELIGIBILITY

Section 401. Protects disabled children against ineligibility for SSI disabled children benefits solely because their parents have been transferred out of the country and have lived out of the country more than 30 days.

Section 402. Expand eligibility for retroactive benefits of deceased recipients to the spouse, the parent of a disabled child, those with whom they were living and the ⅓ reduction for in-kind assistance was applied or if none of the above, other persons who can demonstrate that they furnished the recipient with support during the period covered by the retroactive check. Present law provides that only an eligible spouse may receive the retroactive payment that was due a deceased SSI recipient.

Section 403. Provides that for SSI applicants or recipients under age 65 a person will not be required to file for Social Security or Railroad Retirement benefits, if receipt of such benefits would disadvantage the individual, e.g. loss of eligibility for SSI and subsequently health services under Medicaid.

Section 404. Provides for the reduction from six months to one month the time that an SSI individual and their eligible spouse must be living apart before they will be treated as individuals for determining eligibility for and amount of SSI benefits.

TITLE V—OVERPAYMENTS, UNDERPAYMENTS AND BENEFIT REDUCTIONS

Section 501. This provision limits the rate of recoupment of SSI overpayments. SSA would not be allowed to recoup from SSI recipients who have been overpaid, an amount which would result in decreasing their SSI payment by more than the greater of $10 or 10 percent per month, in those cases not involving fraud.

Section 502. Expansion of the interim assistance program to include payment of the appropriate amount of retroactive SSI funds to the State, when the State has provided financial assistance to SSI recipients who have appealed a termination of benefits, subsequently won the appeal, and have qualified for retroactive SSI benefits.

Section 503. Repeal of provision which reduces the SSI recipient's benefits if the group living facility in which they reside does not meet State standards.

Section 504. Emergency advance payments which can be paid directly by a district Social Security office to those in need of immediate subsistence income would be increased from up to $100 a month to 3 months of SSI benefits.

Section 505. Treatment of concurrent overpayments and underpayments. Provides that when an individual's benefits they had received under SSI involves both underpayments and overpayments, that no adjustment in SSI benefits is to be made by SSA to recover the underpayment until the individual has had opportunity to exhaust their appeal on the overpayment.

Section 506. Improving the notice recipients receive regarding overpayments. When an individual has been overpaid the Secretary is to send the person a notice which contains, in simple language, the following information: the precise amount of the overpayment; the months in which the overpayment occurred; the reason the overpayment occurred; a complete statement of the individual's right to seek reconsideration of the finding that overpayment occurred; the right to seek waiver of repayment; and notice that if waiver or reconsideration is sought, payment of full benefits will continue until a decision is made.

TITLE VI—EXTENSION OF SSI PROGRAM

Section 601. Provides for the extension of the SSI program to Guam and the Virgin Islands effective October 1, 1985.

Section 602. Requires HHS to conduct a study of the feasibility and cost of the extension of SSI to residents of Puerto Rico.

TITLE VII—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Section 701. Provides for HHS to conduct a statistically reliable survey of current and potential recipients of SSI benefits with the objective of determining the number of eligible individuals (adults and children) who do not participate in the program because of lack of knowledge, excess resources, the marginal nature of the amount benefits they would receive or other factors including perceptions about the program. A report would be submitted to the Congress by April 1, 1986.

Section 702. Requires HHS to establish and conduct an outgoing SSI outreach effort.

Section 703. Requires that SSA give special attention to assisting SSI applicants and recipients who are physically or mentally incapable or severely limited in their ability to apply for benefits or to provide information on a regular basis to SSA while they are recipients.

Section 704. Requires that HHS take certain action to increase the clarity and readability of written materials to be used by SSI applicants or recipients.●

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY: A MARYLAND HERITAGE

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, an article appeared in the March 5, 1984 Christian Science Monitor commemorating Maryland's 350th anniversary which gives an excellent account of Maryland's history of religious liberty and toleration.

Maryland was one of the first experiments in the Western World in religious toleration and separation of church and state. Although we now hold religious freedom as one of our most guarded and fundamental liberties, to the 140-odd people in 1634 who crossed the Atlantic Ocean, this was a bold answer to the problem of religious persecution they had encountered in England.

The article follows:

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY: A MARYLAND HERITAGE

(By Lois Green Carr)

ANNAPOLIS

When Maryland enters its 350th year in March of 1984, the Old Line State will join as exclusive club: Among the 50 states, only three can trace their history back 3½ centuries—back to the days of Europe's Renaissance and Reformation.

This alone is cause for celebration. But Maryland has also been an active participant in the fabric of American history. From the frontier days of the 17th-century tobacco coast to the Revolutionary War era when Annapolis served as the US capital; from the original clipper ships to the original "Star Spangled Banner," from the first national road to the first American railroad, from Margaret Brent's 1648 appeal for a vote in the Assembly to Harriet Tubman's underground railroad, and from the first manned balloon ascension to the first airport, the state of Maryland has been an active partner in US history.

During 1984 Maryland is above all celebrating the courage and initiative of the 140-odd people who in 1634 risked their lives in small wooden boats to cross thousands of miles of ocean and establish the fourth permanent English settlement in the wilderness of mainland North America. While Lord Baltimore's settlers were establishing a foothold in North America, Englishmen were reading the first book of Shakespeare's plays and Galileo was being persecuted for daring to think that the Earth was not the center of the universe.

In many respects, these settlers were more distant from the world they had known than orbiting astronauts are from our world today. The hard work of these first adventurers and the efforts of those who followed them carved out a secure foothold in the New World. From these colonies came the country we know.

The early history of Maryland has another important aspect. Maryland was one of the first experiments in the Western world of religious toleration and separation of church and state. Today we regard religious toleration as one of our fundamental liberties and separation of church and state as the public policy best suited to ensure toleration.

But to most men and women of the 17th century, toleration was an evil that allowed the devil to ensnare unwary souls, and one of the goals of any state was to force everyone to accept the same religion. Why an experiment in religious freedom was undertaken as part of the Maryland colony is a fascinating story.

It began as a pragmatic solution to a political problem born of the English Reformation. George and Cecil Calvert, the first and second Lords Baltimore, were the Roman Catholics who undertook a grand enterprise to establish a New World colony. Like other colonial developers, they sought profits for themselves and others. But as Roman Catholics they had a second purpose: to provide a refuge from religious and political disabilities—and sometimes persecutions—they suffered in England.

These disabilities were the product of the struggle between Catholics and Protestants that dominated English life through much of the 1500s and ended in the triumph of Protestants. During the reign of Elizabeth I (1558-1603), laws were passed that permitted Roman Catholics to worship only in private, levied heavy fines for refusing communion in the state-approved Church of England, and excluded Catholics from political life. Many Englishmen of the time believed that to be Roman Catholic was treason, reasoning that if Catholics put the Pope above the King in religion they might do the same in politics. The attempted conquest of England by the Spanish Armada in 1588 did nothing to dispel such suspicions, which continued through the 1600s.

The Calverts hoped to combine profits for investors in their colony with liberty there for Catholics; but, taken together, the two objectives created a difficulty: the Maryland proprietor could not hope to develop his province with the help of only Roman Catholic settlers. England was a Protestant kingdom. To establish an entirely Catholic colony would have been politically impossible. Lord Baltimore needed Protestant settlers, too. But if Protestants and Catholics could not live freely and peaceably together in England, how could they do so in Maryland?

The Calvert solution came in three parts: First, he declared, a white person's religion would be his private affair. White people of any religion were welcome in Maryland. No one was to criticize others for their religious beliefs or practices or try to convert others to his own. (This policy did not extend to Indians or later to Negro slaves). When George Calvert asked Charles I for a grant in the New World, he specified as a goal the spreading of Christianity to barberous people, having no knowledge of the Almighty God." This was a standard statement, representing the cultural outlook of Englishmen. The Calverts' groupings for a policy that would allow Catholics and Protestants to live together as religious and political equals was a pioneering contribution to human freedom—even though the policy did not apply to all.

A second and equally new aspect of Calvert policy allowed any qualified man to hold political office, whatever his religious beliefs. In England, Roman Catholics could not be appointed or elected to public office. In Maryland, Catholics and Protestants shared power in a political process, and for 55 years this cooperation worked. Finally the public tithes that in England supported the Church of England clergy were not allowed in Maryland Congregations, whether Catholic or Protestant, were expected to build churches and pay clergymen of their choice with voluntary contributions. Unfortunately, the result was a lack of churches or ministers for Protestants, a condition that led to trouble.

The first Lord Baltimore died just before the Maryland charter had finished its progress through the royal bureaucracy. Cecil Calvert, the second Lord Baltimore, received the grant, which was worthless without settlers to develop it. Cecil Calvert could not expect to lure even Roman Catholics to his province with promises of religious freedom alone. What he chiefly had to offer was land—millions of acres occupied only by Indians, whose claims all Englishmen ignored.

To attact major investors, he promised grants of 2,000 acres for every five ablebodied men transported and equipped for a year—or 400 acres per settler. Such investors were also to be leaders, with titles of honor and positions in the provincial government. To others, he promised less. But anyone willing to immigrate—rich or poor, Roman Catholic or Protestant—was offered opportunity to acquire land. The land was not free—everyone had to pay the costs of surveying and patenting his tract—and in addition owed a small yearly rent to Lord Baltimore. Nevertheless, the cost was extraordinarily low in comparison to the costs of obtaining land in England.

These generous terms drew settlers. On the first expedition, 17 gentlemen investors sailed in the ships Ark and Dove. The other 120-odd passengers were nearly all indentured servants, who were to repay the investors for transportation costs with four or five years of labor. All the gentlemen were Roman Catholics. The majority of the rest Protestant—and from a broad range of society below the gentry. Whether investors or servants, almost all were young men ready for adventure. There were only a handful of women, although more came later. All hoped to make their fortunes and many hoped for freedoms denied them at home.

Not all who arrived on those ships, and in later crossings, achieved their dreams. They had moved into an entirely new and dangerous environment. Of those who came in the Ark and the Dove, a fifth or more probably died in their first year—and the proportion may have been much higher. Many other settlers died before they had time to acquire or develop land.

Nevertheless, for those who did labor long and hard, Maryland was a promised land. Growing tobacco and corn required little equipment. The poor man who had finished his term of service could easily rent land, raise corn to eat, and quickly make profits from his tobacco crop. Later he could survey and patent land of his own. Some even grew rich and held positions of power that would have been impossible to attain for men of their social origins and education in England. Opportunities on this scale for the poor did not last indefinitely in Maryland. But over at least the first four decades, Maryland was good country for both rich people and poor people who could survive the rigors of the new continent. And all opportunities, as promised, were open to Catholics and Protestants alike.

Although this early experiment in religious toleration ended in 1689, it is remembered with pride by many state citizens as Maryland celebrates its 350th birthday. For 55 years, people of different religions cooperated in the common tasks of building farms in the wilderness and establishing a government that brought the peace and order essential for success. Roman Catholics and Protestants made laws together in an elected assembly and sat together in courts of law that were blind to religion. These men set a precedent to which the people of Maryland later returned. In 1777, with the end of English rule, toleration for all Christians and separation of church and state were made part of the first constitution. With this act, the vision of the early Lords Baltimore became the permanent law of Maryland and today extends to all.●

WEAPONS IN SPACE: THE HIGH RISK FRONTIER

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, the House and Senate Armed Services Committees continue to debate the new military budget proposed by President Reagan. In the near future, the House as a whole will be called upon to consider this budget.

As we continue to struggle with this controversial issue, I again call the attention of my colleagues to the next two editorials in a series by the San Jose Mercury News, dealing with weapons in space.

[From the San Jose Mercury News, Feb. 14, 1984]

GROUNDING SPENDING

The Soviet Union says it wants a treaty banning weapons from space. The Reagan administration is uninterested. Disturbed by the president's plans to spend billions of dollars on a new arms race in space, some members of Congress have attempted to block those expenditures—or at least tie them to negotiations seeking such an agreement.

At stake is whether a treaty can be put in place before new, more dangerous space weapons are deployed—and whether spending programs will be halted before they become unstoppable forerunners of very large future budget deficits.

No one can be sure, without testing the prospect at the conference table, that the Soviets are serious. But they are certainly making noises. Not quite a year ago, the late Yuri Andropov called for an agreement "prohibiting the placement in space of weapons of any kind." Then in August, Andropov pledged a unilateral ban on anti-satellite weapons by the U.S.S.R., and then Soviets submitted to the United Nations a draft treaty calling for destruction of such weapons.

The general response of the Reagan administration has been to say that such a deal would be too difficult to verify. Officials point out that with anti-satellite (ASAT) weapons, a little cheating could do a lot of damage, because there are only a limited number of targets. That objection may be limited application, say American experts outside the government, since it is our own ASAT's, not the Soviets', which would be most difficult to detect.

Whether because of verification fears or simply because it is committed to building new space weapons, the Reagan administration has spurned the Soviet overtures. "Clearly, the conditions do not exist which would make negotiations appropriate," Vice President George Bush told an international meeting a year ago. And Casper Weinberger's still classified but widely leaked Defense Guidance document says that ASAT weapons will be pursued "as a matter of priority." It adds: "We must ensure that treaties and agreements do not foreclose opportunities to develop these capabilities and systems."

The bald assertion that new weapons should take priority over arms control efforts is chilling in its implications. Troubled by the administration's direction, a bipartisan group of 127 House members have signed HJR 120, a resolution calling on the president to begin immediate negotiations with the Soviets to ban all weapons from space. Signers from this area include Representatives Norman Mineta, Leon Panetta and Don Edwards, all Democrats, and Rep. Ed Zschau, a Republican.

The Union of Concerned Scientists, meanwhile, has prepared a draft treaty to limit ASAT weapons, which could provide a starting point for the preparation of a U.S. opening position.

But draft treaties and non-binding resolutions have little force. The real battles have been fought over attempts by some Congress members to "fence in" spending authority and thereby push the administration to the conference table while holding space weapons in abeyance. So far, such efforts have been inconclusive. But this spring's deliberations on the fiscal year 1985 defense budget may be decisive.

[From the San Jose Mercury News, Feb. 15, 1984]

WEAK LINK: ASAT, TALKS

If all goes according to schedule, a six-foot balloon will be sent into orbit from Wallops Island, Va., sometime this spring. And if all goes according to plan, an F-15 jet fighter will maneuver under the balloon and fire an 11-inch warhead that will park in space—and wait until the balloon smashes into it.

The event will be the first targeted test of the Air Force's new anti-satellite weapon. It also has become a symbol of the struggle by some members of Congress to force the Reagan administration to slow down its development of new space weapons—and to start negotiating a treaty to ban them.

That struggle will intensify in budget hearings this spring. Some insiders believe the next few months could be decisive; others believe the Reagan administration may attempt to side-step direct confrontation with its congressional critics, which could make the ASAT program an issue in the November election.

Whether the ASAT can knock a balloon out of orbit already has been linked with the question of whether Reagan can pry more money out of Congress for the program. Last year, with no opposition, Sen. Paul Tsongas, D-Mass., amended the defense authorization bill to specify that none of the money could be spent to test the ASAT against targets in space until the president could certify two things.

One was "that the United States is endeavoring, in good faith, to negotiate with the Soviet Union a mutual and verifiable ban on anti-satellite weapons."

The other was that, pending such a ban, the president could show that such a test was "necessary to avert clear and irrevocable harm to the national security."

All this high-minded language will have little effect; Tsongas himself has said the amendment only requires the president to certify that "the U.S. government is actively assessing the possibility of negotiating." And because the ASAT test schedule already has slipped, the administration may delay the balloon test until after October 1, and then argue the amendment has no effect in the new fiscal year.

The General Accounting Office predicts that the ASAT program could cost tens of billions of dollars by the 1990's, but critics cannot claim any enormous cost escalation yet; after asking $222 million in fiscal year 1984, the administration wants $226 for fiscal year 1985, and $249 for fiscal year 1986.

The concern is that this is the point in the weapons's history when funding begins shifting from research and development to procurement. In fiscal year 1984, only $19 million was for procurement; in fiscal year 1985 the figure is $83 million, and it will be $128 million by fiscal year 1986.

House members last year tried to cut the fiscal year 1984 procurement money, when they didn't have enough votes to do that, they built a legislative fence around it. This particular $19 million cannot be spent, the Senate agreed, until after the president presents another report to Congress.

Due March 31, this report must list "the specific steps the administration contemplates undertaking . . . to negotiate a verifiable agreement with the Soviet Union to ban or strictly limit existing and future ASAT systems."

From a think-tank at Harvard University, the administration has commissioned a report, which was due February 1, on ASAT arms control options. The Harvard report has not been made public. Critics on Capitol Hill have no idea what Reagan plans to say in his March 31 report, or even whether he plans to make such a report; some think he will forgo the $19 million, for now, and say nothing.

Meanwhile, the president has sent Congress his fiscal year 1985 budget, which asks another $83 million in ASAT procurement money, and $143 million for further R&D.

This spring, congressional advocates of arms control almost certainly will try again to condition these funds on negotiations toward a treaty.

But what if the president calls their hand? What if the administration simply begins negotiations that, like its previous negotiations on nuclear arms, go nowhere?

The hard fact is, talking with the Soviets about banning weapons from space could serve as a cover for more weapons development. Even should the Reagan administration sincerely seek a treaty, it would have to overcome enormous obstacles, some of its own making.

As Leslie Gelb wrote recently in the New York Times, "The differences between the two sides in almost every region of the world and on almost every issue are profound and have been building since the mid-70's. Trust is required to conduct negotiations, but, judging from comments by officials on both sides, it is now near rock bottom."

The implication for Congress is clear. Linking ASAT funding to arms talks probably will be an empty and futile (though politically attractive) gesture, so long as the Reagan administration doesn't want a new treaty.

If members of Congress really intend to restrain future deficits and prevent a new arms race in space, they will have to bite the bullet and find the resolve to deny further ASAT funding for now—or at least to cut off procurement money while perhaps granting limited funds for further R&D.

The Soviets proclaimed their own unilateral ASAT ban last August. Congressional actions to slow our program could contain a safety valve that would allow funding to escalate again, if there is evidence that the Soviets are changing the status quo. As in last year's Tsongas amendment, Congress could require the president to show that "clear and irrevocable harm to the national security" would be caused by failure to authorize more spending.

In principle, of course, the goal of negotiating a new treaty on space weapons ought not be abandoned. Should the Reagan team reverse its positions, or be replaced by an administration with different priorities, the quest for such an agreement might again become profitable.

But for the present, indications are that the president and his men will shun such a deal, both because they want the new ASAT system, and because an ASAT treaty might hamper their plans for other space weapons, much larger and costlier than ASAT.●

WOMEN'S ECONOMIC EQUITY ACT—TIMELY ACTION NEEDED

HON. MARIO BIAGGI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as a cosponsor of the Economic Equity Act, I wish to reiterate my strong support for this comprehensive approach to addressing many of the barriers faced by women in our society in achieving economic parity.

Pay equity will clearly be a major issue in Congress this year as we seek to advance many of the individual legislative proposals which are incorporated in the Economic Equity Act. Title I seeks to target reform in the areas of tax and retirement matters. Keeping women economically sound both during their working years—as well as in their retirement years—requires a major restructuring of our pension and retirement programs. The assumptions which drove the creation of the social security system in the 1930's—which stressed women as dependents—are unquestionably out of step with the realities of both the workplace—and the family of the 1980's.

I strongly endorse the reform areas in title I of the act which address tax and retirement matters. To reinforce my concern in these areas, I have also joined as a cosponsor to the individual bills upon which title I is based.

These bills include:

H.R. 4280, Private Pension Reform Act which requires payment of survivor annuity to spouse of a working widow who was fully vested, even if that worker dies before the annuity starting date; requires written consent of both spouses to waive survivor annuity option; permits assignment of pension benefits by State divorce courts in cases related to alimony, child support and marital property rights; lowers the minimum age for participation in a pension plan from 25 to 21; modifies break-in-service rules and abolishes ERISA provision allowing denial of widow's benefits if an otherwise qualified spouse dies within 2 years of choosing survivor benefits (if the death was from natural causes). This bill has been reported from the House Education and Labor Committee where I am the ranking New York member, and awaits action by the Ways and Means Committee;

H.R. 2099 Which permits the establishment of an individual retirement account (IRA) by homemakers and allows alimony to be treated as compensation for the purpose of eligibility to open an IRA;

H.R. 2127 provides a tax credit to employers who hire displaced homemakers of $3,000 in the first year and $1,500 in the second year;

H.R. 2300 Which provides for civil service pension reform by entitling reforms similar to those provided under H.R. 4280 for civil service employees, retirees and their spouses; and

H.R. 2126 which revises the Federal income tax rate to allow single heads of households to a zero bracket amount equal to that allowed on a joint return.

Together, these bills form the basis of an important floor of changes that will assist women who depend upon pensions as their primary source of income. Current policy in both public and private pensions fails to recognize the contribution of a homemaker to a worker's pension. Further, there is no security for these same homemakers in the event of divorce and these bills, together would indeeed provide for such security and assist both women and their families.

The Economic Equity Act also addresses the importance of dependent care for working women. Women are the primary caregivers in families and as such, as most directly penalized by the lack of incentives which allow their entry into the job market.

The participation of women in the work force has increased dramatically—from 23 million in 1960 to 43 million today, and is expected to grow even more to 60 million by 1990. The greatest increase in this participation is found among working women ages 20 to 44, those same women with childbearing and caring responsibilities. Over half of all children today have mothers in the work force, including almost 46 percent of preschool age children.

The Economic Equity Act also recognizes the increase in disabled and elderly dependents within families which often prevent women from working. Today, 8.4 million severely disabled adults, age 18 to 64, are cared for in the family home. Eighty percent of all persons over 65 receive some care from their children and 1 in 8 retired women provide home care for dependents. As such, economic equity through reform of existing tax laws and expansion of services which assist families in the care of dependents, is critical.

Title II of the act proposes to make dependent care more affordable and accessible to women in the workplace. I have joined as a cosponsor of the following individual bills as well which compose title II of the act:

H.R. 1991 which increases the percentage of dependent care costs which can be claimed as a tax credit by low-income families. In 1981, Congress enacted such a sliding scale and over 4 million families now use this credit. However, only 7 percent of the claims by families with an income of less than $10,000;

H.R. 2093 would make this same credit refundable for those families whose income is so low that they owe no Federal taxes; and

H.R. 2242 which would establish a child care information and referral system through the provision of seed money to community-based organizations in order to assist them in the creation of development of such systems.

It should be noted that women with children work because of economic necessity in many cases. According to the Congressional Caucus on Women's Issues, in 51 percent of two-income families with children age 13 and under, the husband earns less than $15,000. The caucus also points out that 5.7 million children age 13 and under, including 1.7 million under age 6, live in single-parent families where the parent works. For these families, dependent care is costly and a range of prices is not available. The amount of money a family would have to pay for such care bears no relation to the family income until that income begins to exceed $50,000 per year. As such, passage of these bills would address the current inequities that plague working women in this area.

Mr. Speaker, I have not addressed all the reforms proposed in the Economic Equity Act, but have, in fact, outlined what I believe to be some of the most important provisions addressing pay and pension reform. We recognize that there is a growing body of support for passage of these bills, and I plan to work, both as a senior member of both the House Education and Labor Committee and the House Select Committee on Aging, to assist in their timely consideration by Congress. I also look forward to reviewing the report by the Department of Health and Human Services on earnings sharing under social security, which will be provided to those of us who are members of the committee's Task Force on Women and Social Security.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to point out that I remain a strong advocate for passage of the equal rights amendment, which is the cornerstone of our agenda to break down existing barriers to women. While the Economic Equity Act represents a comprehensive approach to reform, I believe that we should be equally as enthusiastic in our support for the individual pieces of legislation that are incorporated into the act and which will be the real vehicles for legislative action in this area. Economic justice for all is not merely a women's issue—it is also a civil rights issue and a human rights issue. I stand ready to work with my House colleagues to assist in the achievement of these rights.●

IMPACT AID AMENDMENTS

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, today I am proud to introduce a bill to amend the impact aid program statute. The heart of this program is section 3 of Public Law 81-874 which authorizes payments to schools based on the number of children whose parents work and/or live on Federal property.

This legislation has been drafted by the administration and is consistent with the President's stated policy regarding this important program: namely; that the Federal Government has a clear responsibility to assist school districts that are directly affected by the presence of Federal installations or properties which also serve as places of residence for families with school age children.

I support the overall aim of this legislation and I have consistently insisted for 10 years that a clear distinction exists between the Federal responsibility for the so-called 3(a) and 3(b) children.

Even the strongest critics of impact aid acknowledges that "a" children whose parents live and work on nontaxable Federal property are associated with a clear tax loss to the school districts. However, no such consensus exists regarding "b" payments for children whose parents live or work on Federal property.

It might be useful to recall that, in 1974, Congress eliminated or reduced entitlements for "b" children. For example, "b" children whose parents work outside the State in which the local education agency is located were eliminated as eligible federally connected children, although the 90-percent hold-harmless provision effectively limited this reform. Similarly, entitlements were lowered for "b" children whose parents work outside the county in which the local education agency is located.

These changes were based on the argument that because the parents of these children pay residential property taxes, and because the tax loss from the nonresidential property occurs outside the county or State of the local education agency receiving the impact aid money, there is little or no burden on the local school district. In many instances, the Federal presence has stimulated more economic activity and has led to the creation of more taxable property than otherwise would have existed. The argument has been made that, in a majority of cases, the Federal presence resulted in an expansion of commercial activities, employment, and the local private residential tax base.

Another longstanding criticism of the impact aid "b" payments is that it results in the distribution of large payments to affluent school districts which may have actually benefited from Federal activity and which could easily support a high level of educational expenditure without impact aid. If one agrees that a major purpose of the impact aid program is to provide an in-lieu-of-tax payment for school districts which have suffered some tax revenue loss through Federal presence, logic alone leads one to question the appropriateness of providing payments for "b" children whose parents work outside the jurisdiction of the school system in which the child attends school. This is especially true in light of the fact that residential property values are often inflated as a result of the demand for property created by the Federal presence. Those people who argue that the tax loss created by the nontaxable status of the Federal installation in their area usually display their ambivalence when anyone threatens to remove that Federal activity to another area of the Nation.

We must have the courage to recognize that there is absolutely no way to accomplish meaningful reform and simultaneously maintain these open-ended payments. We should not lose sight of the fact that the impact aid Federal payment is, in reality, an euphemism for the redistribution of citizens' tax dollars from one geographic area to another. The irony is that in many instances, money is taken from poorer areas and redistributed to wealthier ones. How can this be justified?

The administration is correct in insisting that Congress keep its pledge made in 1981 for a 3-year phaseout of the "3(b)" payments, ending September 30, 1984. However, during our committee deliberations of of H.R. 11, a bill to extend various expiring education programs including the impact aid law, I plan to offer an amendment which would provide an exception for school districts that have a high concentration of 3(b) children in their schools—the so-called super "b" schools. Such a compromise is reasonable and is consistent with the budget recommendations submitted by the Republicans on the Committee on Education and Labor. The overall recommendations from the minority on the Subcommittee on Elementary, Secondary, and Vocational Education on which I serve as the ranking Republican member, were identical to the President's budget request for a slight increase in education spending in fiscal year 1985, although some of our priorities differed from those of the administration. One of the slight, but important differences was in the impact aid program as I have outlined to you.

In balance, I feel that congressional action on this legislation is long overdue and I applaud the administration for its efforts. With the few changes that I propose to offer in committee, I think this bill should be enacted into law.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I have included a brief summary of the administration's bill:

IMPACT AID—ADMINISTRATION'S FISCAL YEAR 1985 PROPOSAL

The administration continues to believe that the Federal government has a clear responsibility to assist school districts that are directly affected by the presence of Federal installations or Federal properties which also serve as places of residence for families with school age children. However, financial assistance should not be provided for children who do not represent an actual burden to the school districts which educate them. So-called "b" children do not represent such a burden.

Congress has voted to end support for "b" children after fiscal year 1984. This bill amends the program statute to make it conform to this legislative action. The bill removes provisions of the program statute which determine amounts of entitlements for "b" children; further, language that includes these children for eligibility and for payments under Section 3(d)(2)(B) is removed.

The bill redefines full entitlement, the maximum payment allowed under the law for children who reside in federally subsidized, low-rent housing with a parent employed on federal property to be 15% of the amount determined under calculations currently in the program statute. This is proposed in order to make more equitable payments of funds on behalf of children living in such housing.

The bill would make changes affecting preliminary payments. The amount paid to local school districts in preliminary payments, which are made at the beginning of the fiscal year prior to submission of an application, would be limited to 75 percent of the amount any "Super a" district received under Section 2 or 3(a) of the program for the previous year and reduced to 50 percent of the amount that any other agency received for the previous year under Section 2 or 3(a).

The bill would replace the tiered payment schedule in current law, which has not been implemented in recent years, which a simple formula for making section 3(a) payments. The formula first would provide to each Super a district, a payment of 100 percent of entitlement. Any other LEA would receive a pro rata share of its full entitlement based on the funds remaining available after "Super a" districts are paid. Section 3 payments would be limited to those which are at least $5,000.

For the Disaster Assistance program, the bill would raise the threshold of eligibility under the program statute to $10,000 or 5 percent of prior year operating expenditure, whichever is less.

Finally, the bill would repeal the "hold harmless" provisions enacted under the Education Amendments of 1974. These provisions were intended to help school districts adjust to the effects of declining enrollments caused by decreases in federal activity. The affected districts have now had sufficient time to adapt to these enrollment reductions, making the hold harmless provisions unnecessary.●

INTRODUCTION OF THE OLDER AMERICANS ACT AMENDMENTS

HON. JOHN N. ERLENBORN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to introduce legislation to reauthorize the Older Americans Act of 1965 for 3 additional years. This legislation has been recommended to the Congress by the administration and, I am happy to say, includes several provisions designed to strengthen the ability of the local aging network to meet the needs of our senior citizens.

The major improvements in the act would come in the area of increasing the flexibility of program administration both for the Federal Government and for States. The major provisions of the bill are as follows:

Under existing law States receive funds under title III of the act under four separate authorizations. Under this arrangement, States receive separate allocations for administration, supportive services, congregate meals, and home-delivered meals. The administration proposes to consolidate these four authorizations into a single allocation while preserving all of the organizational and programmatic requirements of the current act. In merging these authorizations, the administration is not proposing a block grant. Rather it is addressing the need expressed in many States for additional flexibility in the administration of Older Americans Act funding. Because of the increased flexibility called for under the bill, States would be much better able to address the special conditions and challenges facing the elderly in their jurisdiction. The mix of services needed in my State of Illinois, for example, differs from that needed in Mississippi.

The bill would also transfer the U.S. Department of Agriculture cash-or-commodities program to the Department of Health and Human Services. Currently, over 90 percent of the resources distributed under this program are distributed in the form of cash. The logic for transferring the program to HHS, therefore, is quite strong. In addition, States will remain eligible to receive donated commodities from USDA, as well as having the right to purchase additional USDA commodities if they so desire. Finally, a 3-year hold-harmless is included in the legislation to assure that no State will be adversely impacted by the transfer. I believe that this particular provision will not only simplify the Federal administration of our aging programs, but also will save local agencies on aging and the States from significant paperwork requirements.

The administration also proposes to require the States to establish and publish, before the beginning of their program year, their goals for meals and the estimated cost per meal. This requirement is designed to help the public make their needs known as priorities are established within each State. It should also help alleviate any concern local providers may have about the impact of the consolidation of the title III authorizations.

The bill considerably streamlines the training, research and discretionary projects authority included in title IV of the act, thus giving the Commissioner on Aging proper authority and flexibility to meet the changing needs of our elderly population. The title, as revised, would continue to provide authority for grants and contracts for training and recruiting personnel for the field of aging, multidisciplinary centers of gerontology, research and development projects, demonstration projects, and national impact activities.

Finally, the bill would allow the Secretary of Labor to transfer to the Administration on Aging the task of distributing funds to State Agencies on Aging for the 22 percent of the community services employment program, which goes to the States rather than to the national contractors. This change is designed to improve coordination between the title V program and other Older Americans Act supported activities.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this proposal addresses many of the problems facing the aging network in providing services to senior citizens. It is my hope that the Committee on Education and Labor will take a careful look at this legislation as it moves forward with reauthorization this year.

A copy of a section-by-section of the bill follows:

OLDER AMERICANS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1984—SECTION-BY SECTION SUMMARY

SHORT TITLE

Section 1 provides the short title of the bill. When enacted, it would be cited as the "Older Americans Amendments of 1984".

CONSOLIDATED AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR STATE GRANT PROGRAM

Section 2 of the draft bill would eliminate the separate appropriations authorizations for supportive services and senior centers, congregate and home-delivered meals, and State plan administration under title III of the Older Americans Act of 1965 ("the Act"), and would provide instead a single consolidated authorization of appropriations for both administrative costs and service delivery under this program. All separate ceilings on spending for certain purposes would be eliminated, and the Federal share of all program costs would be limited to 85 percent, the current law match rate for parts B (supportive services and senior centers) and C (nutrition services).

Included in the consolidated authorization of appropriations for the State grant program would be an amount equal to the FY 1984 funding for cash-or-commodities meals assistance program presently administered by the Department of Agriculture under section 311(d) of the Act, which would be repealed by section 3 of this draft bill.

This section would amend the Act to provide that the populations-based formula presently used to allocate funds for the services program would be used to allocate all Federal funding; the separate population-based formula for allocating State administrative funds, and the formula based on number of meals served used for distributing commodities assistance funding, would be eliminated. However, in order to afford State time to adjust to changes in funding levels, the draft bill provides that for FYs 1985, 1986, and 1987 amounts equal to the total FY 1984 funding for these purposes would be distributed to States in the same proportions as for FY 1984.

This section would extend authorizations of appropriations for the State grant program for three years, through FY 1987. It would authorize appropriations of $760,746,000 for FY 1985, $781,769,000 for FY 1986, and $802,414,000 for FY 1987.

AMENDMENTS TO USDA COMMODITIES PROGRAM

Section 3 of the draft bill would amend section 311 of the Act to eliminate the requirement that the Secretary of Agriculture provide assistance to States in the form of cash or commodities for each meal served under their title III nutrition programs. The Secretary of Agriculture would retain the authority to donate agricultural commodities acquired under price support and surplus removal programs for nutrition services under the Act. Authority would be continued for States to have the Secretary of Agriculture purchase commodities on their behalf for use in providing nutrition services.

OTHER AUTHORIZATIONS OF APPROPRIATIONS (FEDERAL COUNCIL ON THE AGING; INDIAN TRIBES)

Section 4(a) of the draft bill would authorize funding for the Federal Council on the Aging of $175,000 for each of FYs 1985, 1986, and 1987.

Subsection (b) would authorize funding for direct grants to Indian tribal organizations of $7,500,000 for FY 1985, $7,672,000 for FY 1986, and $7,836,000 for FY 1987.

CLARIFYING AMENDMENT CONCERNING VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS FOR NUTRITION AND SUPPORTIVE SERVICES

Section 5 of the draft bill would amend the Act to make clear that projects providing nutrition or supportive services under the State grant program are not authorized to charge for those services, but are required to afford participating individuals an opportunity to make a voluntary contribution to the cost of the service provided, and that such voluntary contributions must be used for the services provided under the program.

REQUIREMENT TO ESTABLISH GOALS FOR NUTRITION SERVICES

Section 6 of the draft bill would establish a new State plan requirement concerning nutrition services, intended to help ensure that nutrition services are responsive to the needs of local communities. States would be required to publish before the beginning of the fiscal year their goals as to the number of meals to be served under the program in each of the planning and service areas within the State, and the cost per meal, and to publish after the end of the year a statement of the actual numbers of meals served and the cost of those meals. In order to give States time to comply, this amendment would become effective beginning with the first State fiscal year during Federal FY 1986.

AMENDMENTS TO AUTHORITY FOR DISASTER RELIEF TO STATES

Section 7 of the draft bill would make amendments to the authority to provide funds under the Act to States for disaster relief services, in order to make this authority more useful in responding to emergencies.

Subsection (a) would permit payments to be made to States in the form of grants (present law permits payment only by way of reimbursement, thus making it difficult to deliver the funds when they are most urgently needed).

Subsection (b) would permit payments under this provision to be used for nutrition services (present law permits use of these funds only for supportive services).

REVISION OF TITLE IV—TRAINING, RESEARCH, AND DISCRETIONARY PROJECTS AND PROGRAMS

Section 8 of the draft bill would revise title IV of the Act. This title would continue to provide authority for grants and contracts for training and recruiting personnel for the field of aging, multidisciplinary centers of gerontology, research and development projects, demonstration projects, and national impact activities. However, requirements to give priority to certain projects, detailed descriptions of projects and activities which may be funded, and ceilings on funding for certain purposes would be eliminated. Appropriations would be authorized for the purposes of title IV of $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1985, $5,115,000 for FY 1986, and $5,224,000 for FY 1987. Language is included to ensure that there is an equitable distribution of research and development funds between projects serving urban and rural areas.

DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY FOR STATE GRANTS FOR COMMUNITY SERVICES EMPLOYMENT

Section 9 of the draft bill would permit the Secretary of Labor to delegate to the Secretary of Health and Human Services authority to make grants to State agencies for community services employment under title V of the Act.

TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

Section 10 of the draft bill makes various technical amendments.

EFFECTIVE DATE

Section 11 of the draft bill provides that the amendments made by the bill to the Older Americans Act of 1965 would become effective October 1, 1984.

AGE DISCRIMINATION REPORTING REQUIREMENTS

Section 12 of the draft bill would amend the requirements under the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 for reports by Federal departments and agencies to the Secretary of Health and Human Services, and by the Secretary to the Congress. The present requirement for annual reports would be amended to provide for such reports after 1983 only as the Secretary deemed necessary. This change would save staff time and would not result in a loss of useful information provided to the Congress.●

TRIBUTE TO THOMAS C. GIORDANO

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, Junior High School 45, Bronx, N.Y., is in the process of changing its name to the Thomas C. Giordano School. At this time I would like to pay tribute to Thomas C. Giordano, an outstanding citizen who died recently.

Thomas C. Giordano was born on August 5, 1936. He spent his whole life in the Belmont community of the Bronx, N.Y. Throughout his life Tom served his community with love and a dedication that reached out and touched everyone he knew. Tom started his teaching career at JHS 45 in the Bronx in 1959, where he became affectionately known to children and staff as Mr. G. From 1965 to June 1973 he served as dean of discipline. On September 1, 1973, he became assistant principal of JHS 45. Tom's skill and dedication as an educator was well recognized by his peers and in December of 1975 he was assigned principal of PS 205 in the Bronx. While at PS 205, Tom was able to influence the lives of many young children. He always had time for their problems and their needs, no problem was too small and to Tom every child was special. Tom was also instrumental in having the school named after Fiorello H. La Guardia. Tom served as principal of this school until his untimely death on October 1, 1983.

Despite his deep commitment to his job, Tom was an active community member who was highly respected by local civic, religious and political organizations. Tom approached his civic responsibilities with vigor, a deep sense of duty and a genuine concern for his fellow citizens. There was always time in Tom's busy schedule for children and you could regularly see him on the local basketball court, softball field, or football field tutoring neighborhood youngsters. And they could not have had a better teacher. Tom was considered a premier athlete in his community. His prowess extended to softball, baseball, basketball and football. He was noted as a world-class softball player with the Metropolitan Allstar Players. In 1968 at the World Tournament in Quebec, Canada, he hit the longest homerun witnessed at that time.

Tom was also highly committed to the Italian-American community and he worked tirelessly to organize the Forum of Italian-American Educators (FIAME) which has flourished and grown to include hundreds of members. He served on the executive board, the political action committee, and the student affairs committee. Tom was acutely sensitive to the needs of the Italian-American community in Belmont and he kept alive many of the fine traditions from the old country.

Thomas C. Giordano left behind a legacy of love, commitment, and caring to the schoolchildren of district 10 and the entire Belmont community. Tom was also a devoted family man. His lovely wife Kathleen and their five children will sorely miss Tom. All who knew him are diminished by his loss.

The spectrum of Tom's love and caring knew no racial, ethnic or social boundaries. He was always there to extend a helping hand to all those in need, both young and old. He was never too busy to stop and talk with troubled youths or concerned citizens. Anyone who knew him was touched by his warmth and genuine concern. His memory will remain in the hearts of the thousands of people he reached out to.

Thomas C. Giordano represented the best of what the Bronx has to offer. Perhaps in identifying several of his many deeds one can better appreciate the type of humanitarian Tom was and the many contributions he made to the entire Bronx community.

Tom was one of the three founding fathers of the Belmont Athletic Association (1958) which became the largest youth activity program in the county, serving 1,500 young men and boys at its peak.

Tom was a charter member of the Fordham Kiwanis International, established 1967-77, as a youth services chairman. He was vice president of the Belmont Athletic Association from 1960 to 1983. As the director of the Belmont Center, Tom worked extensively with the police athletic league. Never retreating from his commitment to young people, Tom was teacher in charge of the vacation playground at JHS 45 from 1958 to 1983, and he wrote a proposal for summer and year-round programs for title I programs at JHS 45. He was also the little league manager and coach of the basketball team at JHS 45 for 10 years.

The Italian-American community is indebted to Thomas C. Giordano for his work or their behalf. As the founding father of FIAME Tom shall forever represent the "soul" of that organization and his memory will serve as a symbol of the dignity of the Italian-American community both in New York City and throughout this great Nation that Tom loved so dearly. It was through Tom's strength and determination that FIAME was able to grow and develop. Tom sought to create and substantiate a bilingual and Italian language program at Christopher Columbus High School. He also worked hard on behalf of the Italian-American professional and was instrumental in their great progress during the past 20 years. In addition to his long time commitment to FIAME, Tom was also a member of the Knights of Columbus, and the St. Martin of Tours Council. Highly active in his church, Tom was an officer of the Junior Holy Name of Mount Carmel Church.

This is but a small example to the type of person Thomas C. Giordano was. All of us who knew him were amazed at his boundless energy and his tremendous capacity to help and serve others. We are all better people for having known Tom and he will survive in our memories as a man of dignity, a man of love, a man who dedicated his entire life to the service of others—especially those in need. Tom will forever remain as an inspiration to all who strive to serve their fellow man.●

AIR FORCE HONORS HARD-WORKING SERGEANTS FROM GUAM

HON. ANTONIO BORJA WON PAT

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, it was recently called to my attention that there will soon be four new Chief Master Sergeants from Guam in the U.S. Air Force.

For the uninitiated the Chief Master Sergeant's rank is the highest rank attainable for an enlisted member of the Air Force. This rank is clearly not won by the vast majority of men and women who serve. It is reserved for only the select few who have shown the highest level, training, devotion to duty and country, and of course, leadership ability.

The four from Guam who have just achieved the rank of Chief Master Sergeant are: Chief M. Sgt. Roland S. Combado, Hq. Air Force Communications Command; Chief M. Sgt. Tomas Q. Fernandez, 603 Military Airlift Support Squadron (MAC); Chief M. Sgt. Augusto F. Cepeda, Hq. U.S. Air Force Europe; and Chief M. Sgt. Selectee Francisco G. Benavente, 3900 Computer Services Squadron (to attain rank in fall, 1984).

The success of these outstanding men deserves noting. We who serve, as I do, on the House Armed Services have heard extensive testimony that we are losing men of the excellence exhibited by the top noncommissioned officers. I am doubly pleased therefore to know that the leadership of today is in the hands of men such as these who are the backbone of our military and our ability to deter aggression against this Nation.

These men are also a continuing reflection of years of proud service to this Nation by the people of Guam. Today, there are over 5,000 men and women from my island serving in the Armed Forces of the United States. Guamanians have won a well-deserved reputation as professional military men and women. The men whom I mention today continue that proud tradition.

To these men, their families and to countless others who serve America, often at great personal risk, I offer my congratulations and appreciation. They all too often work in the most difficult conditions at less than appropriate pay or benefits. They do so with never a complaint and with a sense of duty and accomplishment seldom found in other areas of either public or private enterprise.

When an airman has risen to the top of this profession, he is awarded a special certificate by the Chief Master Sergeants of the Pentagon. I believe that the wording of this certificate is especially appropriate and ask that it be included in the RECORD at this time. Thank you.

HEADQUARTERS, U.S. AIR FORCE,
Washington, District of Columbia.

Be it known to all who see these presents, that Chief Master Sergeant Augusta "Gus" Tepeda has been inducted into the membership of the Chief's Group upon elevation to the grade of Chief Master Sergeant in the United States Air Force. Implicit in individual membership in this select group is the creed that its members are individually to be regarded as people . . .

who cannot be bought;
whose word is their bond;
who put character above wealth;
who possess opinions and a will;
who are larger than their vocations;
who will not lose their individuality in a crowd;
who do not hesitate to take chances;
who will be as honest in small things as in great ones;
who will make no compromise with wrong;
whose ambitions are not confined to their own selfish desires and interests; who will not say they do it "because everybody else does it";
who are true to their friends through good report and evil report, in adversity as well as prosperity; who do not believe that shrewdness, cunning, and hardheadedness are the best qualities for winning success; who are not ashamed or afraid to stand for the truth when it is unpopular, who can say "no" with emphasis, although all the world is saying "yes".

Presented by the Chief Master Sergeants of the Pentagon.●

SENATOR BAKER SPEAKS HIS MIND

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, Senator HOWARD H. BAKER, JR., of Tennessee will retire next year. His absence from our deliberations in Washington will be a loss to the Congress and to the country. Recently, he gave us some intriguing and thought-provoking ideas about how we might improve the congressional process. I commend them to your attention and to the attention of our colleagues.

At this time, I wish to insert in the RECORD, "Congress According to Baker" by Senator HOWARD H. BAKER, JR., in the New York Times Magazine, Sunday, April 1, 1984.

The article follows:

CONGRESS ACCORDING TO BAKER

(By Howard H. Baker, Jr.)

When I first entered the United States Senate in 1967, I was invariably described as my father's son, as my father-in-law's son-in-law and as a "wealthy young lawyer." Seventeen years later, my familial and political associations with Howard Baker Sr. and Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen remain sources of great pride for me. But I am a "wealthy young lawyer" today only when compared with the truly impecunious, the truly ancient and those who have never been called to the bar. What I have been for most of the last 17 years is a full-time Federal employee with no business but Government and no real home but Washington.

Almost from the beginning of my Senate service, I have been waging a one-man crusade to restore the Congress to its original and intended character as a "citizen legislature" and not an assemblage of elected bureaucrats. To this end, I propose a greatly reduced Congressional session, so Congress can stay in closer touch with the people we represent. Lowering our salary accordingly, we should allow outside income. More important, Congress needs to begin to work more closely, less antagonistically, with the President. And so that we might examine the impact of our legislation on Americans, we should limit its life.

Not so long ago, members of Congress were real people with real jobs in real communities throughout the country. They were truly representative of the people who elected them because they played an integral and active part in the civic and economic and social affairs of their constituencies. They went to Washington temporarily and they came home.

I recall quite clearly when my father first went to Congress in the early 1950's. He went to Washington on the train, an overnight trip from Tennessee. He went in January and had no plans to come home before Easter, when Congress would adjourn. He never thought about moving his family permanently to Washington or giving up his home in Tennessee. He never thought about giving up his profession or his business and civic enterprises and personal interests. He was a Tennessean, temporarily in Washington to speak for his neighbors.

For all practical purposes, today's members of Congress consider Washington home, and we're tourists in our own constituencies. We're committed year round to the legislative undertaking. We pass statute after statute forbidding us to do anything but legislate 12 months a year. We're expected to be free of any conflict of interest by abdicating all interests but political power.

As virtual captives of the capital, we think up more and more Government programs—whether we need them or not—because that's all we have to do. We pass thousand-page legislative bills that read more like bureaucratic jargon than public law. We stopped seeing the forest for the trees a long time ago. Now we label the leaves.

An $850 billion Federal budget is only one result of this exclusive concentration on Government. It costs nearly a billion dollars a year just to run the Congress itself, with a staff almost four times as large as it was in my father's day. Members of Congress now make $72,200 a year as Federal employees—several times what most of our constituents make—and still we complain about the high cost of living in Washington and commuting to the state on hurried weekends or overnight excursions.

But the problem is not just a matter of Government expense, or Congressional pay, or nostalgia for a simpler time. Rather, it's a question of function and faithful representation. Congress cannot really be representative, cannot really know or accurately respond to the concerns of the American people while we are strangers in our own country, sequestered from our fellow citizens by public law and the Potomac River.

We in Congress are trustees of the ultimate sovereignty in this country—the full expression of the desires and demands of the American people. But in ourself-imposed isolation, we grow more and more susceptible to the loudest voice or the largest mailing on any given issue. We surrender the power of independent judgment when we have no personal experience or insight to guide us—when we lose contact with the real world and the practical consequences of our political actions.

Our role is to represent the people on major policy decisions, to translate the public will into public law on matters of national and international importance. It is not to manage the Federal establishment to the last detail. We have an executive branch—a President, a Vice President, 13 Cabinet departments and dozens of regulatory agencies—to do that, and we have all the supervisory powers over them we need.

The Constitution defines the roles of the legislative, executive and judicial branches; the powers of the Federal Government, and the essential rights of American citizens in fewer pages than most of the bills—and many of the amendments—we write on the least significant issues, many of which might better be resolved in state legislatures, city councils or even local school boards. But Congress gets into everything because we think it's our job.

For nearly three centuries for example, public education was virtually the exclusive province of local governments. The Federal Government got into the education business in a big way only after World War II, with the G.I. Bill of Rights, but that involvement was largely at the college level, with few regulatory strings attached. A Department of Health, Education and Welfare was added to the Cabinet in 1953, but the direct Federal role in education was still quite limited.

Four years later, with the launch of the Soviet satellite Sputnik, Washington was exhorted to "do something," and it responded with the National Defense Education Act of 1958. Federal aid to education expanded throughout the 1960's and 1970's, and with it regulations on everything from bilingual curriculum to girl's basketball.

Despite this huge Federal involvement, the quality of education has been decreasing. The major reforms now underway in public education are being led by people like Gov. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, not by Federal officials in Washington.

Because Congress habitually yields to the temptation to do something, we get into everything, but we stand increasingly in peril of accomplishing nothing. Twice in two years, the Federal Government has run out of money, because the Congress has failed to approve funds in time to meet the payrolls of executive departments and agencies. The simplest piece of legislation is now regularly festooned with amendments, both relevant and irrelevant, by professional legislators.

I think we can do better, not by doing more but by doing less. Let me suggest a few reforms:

Congress should be in session for only six or so months of the year—with four months at the beginning of the year devoted to the authorization process (enacting laws authorizing Government action on matters of national importance) and two months in the fall devoted to the appropriation process (deciding how much the Government should spend on those actions).

The other half of the year should be spent not in Washington but in the rest of the country—seeing firsthand the practical effect of Federal laws on private lives and enterprise, staying in personal touch with the people we're elected to represent, experiencing real life in America not as distant observers but as involved participants.

The counter argument is that a part-time Congress would cede too much power to a full-time President or be insufficiently versed in complex issues. This argument misses the point of what Congress is supposed to be—the nation's board of directors, with the President as chief executive officer. We couldn't compete with the information that flows to him if we stayed in Washington 13 months a year.

The Supreme Court sits in formal session only six months of the year, but every President and every Congress since Marbury v. Madison, which in 1803 determined the importance of the Court, have understood the co-equal power this "part-time" tribunal wields. As long as the Congress keeps the power of the purse, it will be first among equals in the Federal Government whether it meets three days a year or 365. It is worth recalling that when Congress was a part-time legislature, the Federal Government consistently ran budget surpluses rather than deficits. Whether cause or coincidence, it is a fact.

For working only half the year in Government service, members of Congress ought to get about half the salary we currently pay ourselves—$36,100 a year should be plenty.

Congress should repeal all laws forbidding or limiting income earned by its members from sources other than the Federal treasury. The appropriateness of outside income, fully disclosed and regularly reported, is a political question, not an ethical or a moral one.

If the electorate perceives that a representative is serving special interests to the detriment of the public interest, they can throw the rascal out. Congress itself has exercised its right to discipline or expel members for such conduct.

I believe that while some sacrifice of financial gain may be in the nature of public service, an explicit penalty or prohibition against earned income—as opposed to inherited or otherwise "unearned" income—flies in the face of basic fairness and subverts the work ethic we prize so highly in this country. The surveyors and planters and printers and merchants who founded this country didn't give up their private professions for public service, and they didn't do a bad job.

Congress as an institution should go to the people a great deal more often. No law states that every Congressional hearing must be in Washington. Now and then, a few hearings are scheduled in other parts of the country. But not enough.

In the House of Representatives, the number of oversight hearings actually dropped from about 7,000 in the 96th Congress to about 5,500 in the 97th, with a similar though less pronounced decline in the Senate. Midway through the 98th Congress, it appears this trend is continuing.

We in Congress are a bit like the French police officer in the movie "Casablanca." Whenever a new subject for investigation arises, we round up and interrogate the same small universe of witnesses year in and year out. Although eminently qualified, they are no more than 2,000 out of 235 million Americans, and it's time we called on someone else. The hard information may be about the same, but a few new perspectives would be tremendously valuable.

The potential benefits of taking the Congressional show on the road are great. A good firsthand understanding of what dioxin or a shut-down steel mill can do to a community is simply impossible without a visit to the site. Holding more oversight hearings outside of Washington could also increase their "grass-roots" character and encourage greater and broader citizen participation in the legislative process. The Congress as a whole need not be in session for such hearings to be conducted. Much of this investigative work could be done during the six months that citizen-legislators are away from Washington. Representative democracy is a two-way street, and the mountain has been going to Mohammed long enough.

While I'm at it, let me reform a few other things:

Congress and the President should remember that Pennsylvania Avenue is a two-way street. The antagonism that has grown in between the legislative and executive branches is among the least healthy aspects of Government in our time. The constitutional system of checks and balances need not involve the kind of acrimony, rivalry and contradictory agendas that have come to characterize legislative-executive relations.

Most recent Presidents have come to Capitol Hill once or twice a year, usually to deliver a State of the Union address. These rare appearances have been reduced to a formality, with the Presidents using the Congress as official scenery and the Congress responding with a cacophony of criticism to nearly everything they have to say.

Both the executive and the legislative branches have a responsibility for governing the country; and they ought to work together a good deal better than they do. Thus, a President ought to consult yearly with Congress on formulating a national agenda for action.

Such cooperation is not impossible, and it need not be the inevitable casualty of partisan political warfare. I say this not as a callow political science major but as a scarred and grizzled veteran of the political wars. The biggest problem Republicans and Democrats have today is that too many Americans wish a pox on both their houses. Politicians are too prone to forget that Americans can see through sham. A little less sham and a little more substantive progress and there would be plenty of political credit and success to pass around in both parties.

In recent months, the Congress passed a bipartisan Social Security reform package and a jobs bill as well as a War Powers resolution on Lebanon, the strongest bipartisan statement on American foreign policy in the last 30 years. While the bipartisanship has faded a bit in this election year, these examples showed a strong President and a strong Congress working well together. This kind of consultation, and the broad political support it wins for important initiatives, cannot be overemphasized and should not be underemployed.

Congress should incorporate "sunset" provisions in more of its basic legislation so that effect of the law expires within five years unless it is reauthorized.

President Reagan is absolutely right when he says a Government program is the closest thing to eternal life we will see in this world.

The question is not whether we keep a tea-tasting commission, for example, but rather whether we keep a Department of Education or a CETA job-training program or highway-user tax long after its mission has been accomplished, or worse, hopelessly bungled. The burden of proof is now on the Congress to justify abolishing programs, rather than on the programs to justify themselves. Sunset laws would shift the burden where it belongs.

The sunset approach would allow Congress to examine how the bureaucracy has interpreted the law in its rules and regulations; to see whether or not the law is having its intended effect, and to determine whether it should be renewed, revised or removed. Such an approach would free Congress from writing specific rules and regulations into the law. We would be responsible only for setting Federal policy, and the civil service would be held strictly responsible for its faithful implementation. All of this can be done, and done better, if members of Congress spend less time in Washington and more time closer to home.

There are many more part-time than full-time public servants in this country. They do their public duty, work in private enterprise, campaign gently every day in the coffee shop or at the hardware store and go home to their families, friends and varied interests. They perform all these roles with extraordinary skill and grace and success.

Anyone in politics, from precinct captain to President, is always campaigning one way or another. That's what government by the consent of the governed means, what real democracy is about. A member of Congress doesn't have to be in Washington every day to be a conscientious and skillful legislator, and he or she can't be in Washington every day and remain truly representative of the people "back home."

As I prepare to leave the Senate at the end of my term next year, I'm under no illusion that may call for a "citizen legislature" will be heeded any time soon. But after nearly two decades in Washington, I have no doubt that it should be.●

ACID RAIN

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, despite the scores of studies isolating the causes and documenting the effects of acid rain, this Congress has made little progress in arresting this problem. I urge my colleagues to closely examine the actual and potential impact of this silent killer.

Acid rain can affect human health. My Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor/Health and Human Services/Education recently received a report from the National Institutes of Health entitled the "Potential Human Health Effects of Acid Rain." Although the findings and conclusions are not definitive, the report points to a potentially devastating effect of acid rain: The mobilization of dangerous minerals in drinking water and the food chain. Acidification increases the accumulation of mercury in fish, thereby increasing the risk to toxicity in people who eat fish caught in an acidified region. The report also points to a disturbing result that may affect our children. Quoting from the report:

The acid rain phenomenon increases lead in drinking water and the food chain, thereby increasing human exposure.

The aquatic effects of acid rain in my own State of Massachusetts are well documented and equally devastating. Due to a largely volunteer effort, over 1,200 waterways across the State were tested for their pH level. The results were disturbing. Over 70 bodies of water were acidified or what is commonly called dead. These waterways experienced a severe loss of fish and other aquatic life. In fact, 85 percent of all the lakes, streams and reservoirs sampled by the volunteers were sensitive to acid rain to some degree.

The "Acid Rain Monitoring Project," administered by the Water Resources Center at the University of Massachusetts, should be commended for their fine work in gathering this important data. Over 900 individuals across the State participated in this program.

I am submitting for the RECORD an article written by Dr. Paul Godfrey, the director of the Water Resources Center. It appeared in the March-April edition of the UMASS magazine Contact. I urge my colleagues to review this article.

ACID RAIN

(By Paul Joseph Godfrey)

On the third Sunday of each month, a small all-volunteer army marches forth to do battle. Their mission is to collect scientifically valid data. Their weapons are one-pint plastic bottles. Their enemy is acid rain. They are part of a unique statewide effort known as the Acid Rain Monitoring Project.

Acid rain action is becoming recognized as one of the most insidious threats to the environment in many parts of the world, including Scandinavia, eastern Canada, the Adirondacks, the eastern United States, and the Rocky Mountains. Many lakes in these regions have experienced severe damage, indicated by extreme decreases in fish populations. About 9,000 such lakes have been documented in Sweden, 1,500 in Norway, 200 to 400 in the Adirondacks, and more than 400 in Canada.

Massachusetts has much in common with these areas in terms of water resources. But until the Acid Rain Monitoring Project began, we had relatively little idea of the condition of our lakes and streams, under the onslaught of acid rain. Limited information existed for approximately 600 lakes and a lesser number of streams out of the total of 2,675 lakes and ponds, and 2,027 streams and rivers. Information was needed on many more water bodies, as well as information from critical seasons, especially early spring. The task of obtaining these data by using state or university personnel would have been overwhelmingly time-consuming and expensive. Another way had to be found. In the fall of 1982, the Water Resources Research Center at UMass/Amherst, supported by a grant from Trout Unlimited, initiated its alternative. We proposed to enlist the help of Massachusetts citizens.

Other citizens action groups were already in operation on the acid rain problem in New England. But most of them evaluated pH only, using inexpensive and not terribly accurate pH paper, which requires no training to use. However, the use of pH papers meant that the results of these citizen efforts would never be accepted or used by the scientific community or regulatory agencies. We devised a way to combine citizen involvement with the accuracy of state-of-the-art analytical techniques. Citizens would collect the water samples and bring them to existing professional laboratories for pH and alkalinity analysis using sensitive and accurate instrumentation.

Surprisingly, we had little trouble finding professional laboratories to volunteer for the analysis of samples. They represented a wide spectrum of interests: municipal wastewater and water supply facilities; universities, colleges, high schools, industry; environmental education centers; private laboratories; state, federal, and county laboratories; and private individuals with access to laboratories. All responded generously with their time and equipment.

By the beginning of March 1983, everything was ready for sampling the state on the third Sunday in March. Twelve county coordinators, 75 district coordinators and laboratories, and approximately 800 volunteers were ready with as many sample bottles as could be assembled. Each laboratory had the appropriate chemicals for analysis and had already undergone one quality control check. Each volunteer had selected the lakes and streams he or she would sample.

Within days after the scheduled sampling, data sheets began to trickle into the Water Resources Research Center. The trickle quickly turned to a flood with a new crest after each successive third Sunday, as the volunteer network functioned beyond all expectation. Throughout the spring and summer the Center's staff worked feverishly to develop the computerized database, to respond to the hundreds of requests for information from reporters, and to begin a preliminary review of the results.

Volunteers had sampled 1,229 lakes, ponds and reservoirs, roughly 26 percent of the total in the state. But the heartwarming success of the volunteer effort was cooled by the hard facts of what we learned about the status of our water resources.

Explaining the significance of what we learned requires a brief digression on the nature of acid rain and the way that it affects the chemical dynamics of sensitive environments.

Acid rain is created by emissions of sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides. In the eastern

U.S., at least 90 percent of these emissions are not from natural sources. Instead, they are from the combustion of fossil fuel. Sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides are transformed in the atmosphere to secondary pollutants. If these combine with water vapor, they may fall as wet acid precipitation and become what scientists call wet deposition. The secondary pollutants that do not combine with water vapor are also deposited in dry form as sulfates and nitrates. The environment is girded for an attack of acids, to a degree at least. The forests, soils, geology, and waters are all somewhat prepared to neutralize incoming acids. Some environments have large amounts of acid neutralizing capacity and can handle present levels of acid deposition without difficulty. Much of the farm belt in the midwest has this capacity. Other environments like those in Massachusetts are poorly equipped. The soil is thin and high in natural organic acids, largely due to acid-producing coniferous forests. The geology is relatively unreactive. The water resources of the region reflect their watershed and have little acid-neutralizing capacity. Only small quantities of acid deposition can be tolerated without noticeable change. Research suggests that these sensitive environments can tolerate precipitation acidities with a pH of 4.6 or higher. Expressed as sulfate, deposition levels greater than 20 pounds per acre cannot be tolerated without significant environmental changes. Massachusetts receives 40 to 70 percent more than this maximum amount.

Although New England lakes are generally more sensitive to acid rain than midwestern lakes, not all of them are the same. In fact, they display a remarkable degree of variability in various characteristics including area, depth, productivity, and acid neutralization capacity. Each of these characteristics helps to determine the sensitivity of the water body to acid inputs.

Sensitivity reflects the degree to which a lake, stream, or reservoir can absorb acid without exhibiting adverse chemical or biological changes. If the water body and its watershed exhaust their neutralizing ability; pH will change rapidly and result in increased mobilization of heavy metals and aluminum from the watershed and corresponding losses of aquatic life.

The Acid Rain Monitoring Project has divided the continuum of sensitivity into six categories:

[In parts per million]

Not sensitive	20
Sensitive	10–20
Highly sensitive	5–10
Endangered	2–5
Critical	0–2
Acidified	(1)

[1] O, pH 5.0 or lower

Ecosystems that are not comparatively sensitive exhibit a relatively small increase in alkalinity during the biologically productive months but are otherwise quite stable. Ecosystems that are endangered or critical exhibit much wider fluctuations. In the spring, alkalinities drop to their yearly minimum because of melting of the winter's accumulation of acid snow. Some recovery occurs in summer. The improvement is due in part to alkalinity generated by biological productivity but prinicipally to the fact that acid inputs are reduced during the dry summer months. Lakes and streams in the critical and endangered category are perilously close to becoming acidified. Small changes in acid input, either annually or from day to day, cause major changes in pH. Aquatic organisms are subjected to rapidly changing pH regimes—physiologically more traumatic for the organism than constantly low pH.

Acidified lakes and systems have lost all of their acid-neutralizing capacity; pH is sufficiently low to eliminate most fish species. Technically, an acidified lake or stream has no alkalinity and a pH below 5.0. Most have a pH in the mid-4s, near equilibrium with atmospheric inputs. These aquatic systems show little of the variation in alkalinity common to the other categories. The watershed has lost its capacity to regenerate acid-neutralizing capacity, except perhaps over hundreds or thousands of years. With this categorization as background, the Acid Rain Monitoring Project preliminary results can be put in perspective. We have chosen to focus on the early spring period because it is the most critical for aquatic organisms and reveals the water body at its worst. Other surveys, including the previous data for Massachusetts, taken only during the summer or at random times throughout the year, overlook this critical period.

Our results for April are categorized according to sensitivity, that is, their relative position on the alkalinity-pH curve.

	Percentage	Number
Not sensitive	15	189
Sensitive	23	284
Highly sensitive	21	264
Endangered	19	228
Acidified	6	70

Overall, 85 percent of the lakes, streams, and reservoirs sampled by our volunteers were sensitive to acid deposition to some degree. Because volunteers chose their sampling sites on the basis of proximity, personal concern, or knowledge of records of sensitivity, the selection was random. Therefore, it is not appropriate to extrapolate these figures to all water bodies in the Commonwealth.

As Table I shows no county is immune to the effects of acid deposition, but northern Worcester, Bristol, Barnstable, and Plymouth Counties are all severely impacted. Only in Middlesex, Essex, and southern Worcester Counties are less than one third of the lakes and streams in endangered, critical, or acidified condition. These results indicate that many Massachusetts water resources are precariously close to depletion of their acid neutralizing capacity. These are other indications that matters have taken a turn for the worse.

One of the most complete data sets detailing historical change in water chemistry in Massachusetts is that for water supply reservoirs. Here changes are obvious. Many municipalities are finding it necessary to treat their drinking water in order to decrease the acidity. The reason is not acidity per se but the fact that the acidity leaches heavy metals from the watershed and, especially, the distribution pipes. For example, in Boston, where 85 percent of the service pipes are still made of lead, pH treatment to avoid dissolving lead into the tap water is imperative and costs the Metropolitan District Commission $1.2 million per year. In Amherst, lead levels in the drinking water at an elementary school exceeded drinking water standards by threefold when pH treatment had to be temporarily suspended. The only known source of lead was the solder joining the copper pipes in the school.

It's no surprise that acidity poses problems for drinking water supplies: 79 percent of the available surface drinking water is highly sensitive or worse to acidification according to the Department of Environmental Quality Engineering (DEQE). In a recent study of New England drinking water the New England Water Works Association (NEWWA), 85 percent of the water supplies were termed "highly aggressive," that is capable of dissolving metals from the pipes.

Recent indications suggest that reservoirs are fast approaching acidification. Sixty percent have 10 mg/1 of alkalinity or less, but there is a more disturbing symptom. When watersheds become acidified, sulfate replaces bicarbonate as the dominant anion, or negative charged ion, in the water. This is called "sulfate breakthrough." Using several indices of sulfate breakthrough, DEQE has observed that 60 to 70 reservoirs have had their watersheds acidified within the last four years. Even though there may still be some acid-neutralizing capacity left in the reservoir, it will not last long. Quabbin Reservoir is one of these. Data from NEWWA also show that a greater percentage of reservoirs in Massachusetts have "aggressive" water than any other New England state.

The fisheries of Massachusetts are also suffering. The damage usually results from a combination of low pH and high aluminum concentration. Aluminum and other heavy metals are leached from the surrounding watershed by acidic runoff. The number of lakes requiring stop-gap liming to avoid fish loss has dramatically increased. Thirteen lakes presently exhibit severe impairment of natural fish reproduction, a symptom typical of acidified lakes.

The Quabbin is especially interesting because it is probably the single most valuable fishery in the state. The Division of Fisheries and Wildlife has reduced its stocking of the acid sensitive rainbow trout by half because the catch has dropped 46 percent in the past two years.

Smelt are the principal food for sportfish in the Quabbin. They have experienced a population crash since 1980. There has been a 99 percent decline in young-of-the-year smelt and a 98 percent decline in the occurrence of smelt in the stomachs of lake trout. This past spring heavy egg mortality was observed during smelt spawning in the tributaries—up to 90 percent mortality in the most acid tributaries. Seemingly healthy eggs were observed to have died in tributaries experiencing a drop in pH over just a few days.

In tributaries to the Bickford Reservoir near Fitchburg, the water was lethal to stocked trout in three days to two weeks, even though these streams historically had natural trout populations. The relationship with stream acidity and aluminum concentrations was quite clear. Aluminum leached from the watershed is typically the direct cause of fish mortality in acidified waters.

Finally, the Division of Fisheries and Wildlife has recently surveyed 18 tributaries to the Millers River in north-central Massachusetts. In 1953 these tributaries had healthy populations of trout, dace and suckers. All had pHs in the 6s. At present, only eight retain the same fish community; these have pHs in the high 5s and alkalinities over five parts per million. Eight have lost the dace and sucker species; pH is in the 5s, but alkalinities are critical. Two have lost all fish and much of the other aquatic life; pH is in the 4s and no alkalinity remains.

What can be done? Until major government action is undertaken to curtail the problem, research will at least prepare us to meet it. Analysis of the Acid Rain Monitoring Project data, particularly the comparison with historical data, will permit a very accurate description of the current status and the trend toward acidification. The data will also allow us to refine the available predictive models of lake and stream acidification. And, of course, the data will provide a rock-solid benchmark to which we can compare our water resources in the future.

The Acid Rain Monitoring Project has touched a deep concern among Massachusetts citizens for the effects of acid rain on our environment. The unmistakable support of Massachusetts citizens from all walks of life for an understanding and resolution of the acid rain problem presents a powerful message to the nation and its policymakers.●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR SOVIET JEWRY

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I am proud and honored to once again participate in the Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil For Soviet Jewry, and I thank the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. COUGHLIN, for organizing this effort. I believe that, as Members of this body, we must continue to take every opportunity to speak out against the flagrant denial of basic human rights in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, conditions in the Soviet Union have been deteriorating at a rapid rate for those of Jewish faith. Not only is emigration at an alltime low, with a mere 1,218 Jewish people allowed to leave in 1983 compared to the almost 51,000 allowed to leave in 1979, but reports of widespread harrassment and oppression are on the increase. the anti-Semitic policies of the Soviet Government have made the daily existence of many Soviet Jews a difficult, frustrating and seemingly hopeless, struggle for survival. The fundamental freedom to learn about, and take pride in, one's culture, history and religion is denied to the Soviet Jewish citizen. Individuals who openly attempt to develop their Jewish identity are sure to encounter various forms of intimidation and persecution. The desire on the part of Soviet Jews to escape this persecution through emigration is considered a punishable crime.

A tragic case in point is that of 23-year-old Aleksandra Lein. Aleksandra, daughter of former prisoner of conscience, Evgeny Lein, applied for permission to emigrate with her family in April 1978. Permission was refused to the Lein family in August of that year on grounds of "secrecy." Since that time, additional applicants to emigrate have been repeatedly and systematically denied. The Leins, Aleksandra included, are well known among the Refuseniks since they study Hebrew and Jewish culture and history. This labels them as "activisits" in the lexicon of the Soviet regime.

Shortly after Aleksandra's first application to emigrate, she was dismissed from the night institute where she took classes. Later, she had the frightening and humiliating experience of being assaulted in the street. The police did everything possible to avoid presssing charges against her attackers. Finally, this past January, a few short months before she was to marry, Aleksandra was fired from her job as a computer operator. Aleksandra's dismissal coincided with the firing of six other prominent Refuseniks—a further attempt to harrass the Jewish community as part of the Soviet leadership's intensified anti-Semitic campaign.

Aleksandra, a spirited and strong-willed young woman, took the issue to court, hoping to have her job reinstated. Her employer testified on her behalf. He told the court that she was an excellent employee—knowledgeable, skillful, and responsible. The court, however, chose to rule against Aleksandra, and for the first time, publicly stated that "those who apply to emigrate will be the first to go in cases of staff reduction."

Although Aleksandra is preparing another court appeal, her experience demonstrates in a clearer fashion than usual that anti-Semitic policies are rampant. Aleksandra, and others like her, must be admired for their bravery as well as their ability to persevere in the face of discrimination, economic hardship, and even physical abuse. However, they are counting on our efforts to bring hope for their future. We cannot let them down. I urge each of my colleagues to work not only toward increased emigration for Soviet Jews, but toward freedom and justice for those who, for one reason or another, remain in the Soviet Union.●

PROTECT AMERICAN PRODUCTS FROM COUNTERFEITERS

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. DOWNEY of New York. Mr. Speaker, in the final hours of the first session I introduced H.R. 4502, legislation which uses special trade preferences as a lever to stop industrial counterfeiting by developing countries.

Today, along with 14 of my colleagues, I am introducing a bill which makes several improvements to the original. Most importantly, it affords the same protection for published products as the first bill provided for manufactured goods, and therefore it has the expanded backing of the American publishing industry. Additionally, this new bill uses language similar to that already enacted as part the Caribbean Basin Initiative, language proved successful in halting the pirating of textbooks in the Dominican Republic and of cable television signals by Jamaica. Finally, this new bill is very similar to a bill working its way through the Senate.

Industrial counterfeiting by foreign nationals is a serious and growing economic problem for us. A recent International Trade Commission study estimated that American companies are losing from $6 to $8 billion in sales each year and at least 131,000 jobs.

Many counterfeit goods are sold abroad, cutting into needed markets for American goods. A wide variety of products are popular targets including clothing, precision tools, drugs, farm chemicals, and high technology equipment to name a few.

While the impact on our American manufacturers is clear, there is little they can do legally. This bill attempts to solve the problem at its source. Under the generalized system of preferences (GSP), certain countries such as Taiwan, Brazil, and South Korea qualify for duty-free tariff treatment in import dealings with our country in order to promote their economic development. This program has been beneficial to the countries known to be the source of the most notorious counterfeiters. The bill I am introducing today ties future GSP benefits to the willingness of each country to enact and enforce stricter laws protecting intellectual property rights. The GSP is due to be renewed before the end of the year and I intend to add this bill as an amendment. I invite my colleagues' support and ask that a copy of the new version be printed here:

Section 502 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2462) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of subsection (b)(6);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of subsection (b)(7) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and";

(3) by adding at the end of subsection (b)(7) the following:

"(8) if such country fails to provide under its law adequate and effective means for foreign nationals to secure, exercise and enforce exclusive rights in intellectual property, including patent, trademark and copyright rights, unless the President receives assurances satisfactory to him that the country is taking appropriate steps to provide such means and he submits a written report to both houses of Congress detailing the nature of those assurances.";

(4) by amending the last paragraph of subsection (b) to provide:

"Paragraphs (4), (5), (6), (7) and (8) shall not prevent the designation of any country as a beneficiary developing country under this section if the President determines that such designation will be in the national economic interest of the United States and reports such determination to the Congress with his reasons therefor.";

(5) by striking out the "and" at the end of subsection (c)(3);

(6) by striking out the period at the end of subsection (c)(4) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and";

(7) by adding at the end of subsection (c)(4) the following:

"(5) the extent to which such country is providing under its law adequate and effective means for foreign nationals to secure, exercise, and enforce exclusive rights in intellectual property, including patent, trademark and copyright rights."; and

(8) by adding at the end of section 502 the following:

"(e)(1) Not later than January 1, 1986, the President shall determine whether each beneficiary developing country designated as of the effective date of this Act satisfies the requirements of section 502(b)(8) and he shall report to Congress his determination and the reasons therefor. If the President determines that any such country fails to satisfy these requirements, he shall terminate such designation consistent with the provisions of section 502(a)(2).

"(2) With respect to any country for which the President has received assurances under section 502(b)(8), the President shall, not later than January 1, 1987, and annually thereafter, report to Congress the extent to which such assurances have been satisfied."●

HONORING THE MEMORY OF THOSE ADVENTURERS OF 1633

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues Maryland Day, which was March 25, 1984. March 25 was designated "Maryland Day" to honor the memory of those adventurous individuals who came to Maryland 350 years ago on the Ark and the Dove. The Ark and the Dove were the first two boats to land on Maryland shores on November 22, 1633. These brave pioneers were the founding settlers of the great State of Maryland and I wish to list their names here today to recognize the contributions to the development and growth of the State of Maryland.

THE ADVENTURERS OF 1633

Most of the data summarized below was taken from Harry Wright Newman's "Flowering of the Maryland Palatinate," 1961 (Repr.: Baltimore: Genealogical Publishing Company, 1984). The letters following the names of the known adventurers are explained following the list.

CONGRESSMAN UDALL'S VOTING RECORD

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, it has become my practice from time to time to list my votes in the House of Representatives here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I strongly believe that the people of Arizona have a right to know where I stand on the issues decided by the House, and I have found that printing my record here is the best way to provide that information.

This is not an all-inclusive list. I have omitted noncontroversial votes such as quorum calls, motions to resolve into the Committee of the Whole House, and motions to approve the Journal of the previous day.

The descriptions are necessarily some what short, and I am sure that some of my constituents will have additional questions about the issues described here. So I invite them to write me for specifics, or to visit by district office at 300 North Main in Tucson or 1419 North Third Street, Suite 103, in Phoenix.

The list is arranged as follows:

VOTING LIST

KEY

1. Official rollcall number;
2. Number of the bill or resolution;
3. Title of the bill or resolution;

4. A description of issue being voted on;
5. The date of the action;
6. My vote, in the form Y=yes, N=no, and NV=not voting.
7. The vote of the entire Arizona delegation, in the form (Yes-No-Not voting);
8. An indication whether the motion or amendment was passed or rejected; and
9. The total vote.

201. H. Con. Res. 91. First Budget Resolution, Fiscal 1984. Adoption of the rule (H Res 243) providing for House floor consideration of the conference version of the resolution to set budget targets for the fiscal year ending Sept. 30, 1984. Adopted 265-150: Y(2-3-0), June 23, 1983.

202. H.R. 1183. Tax Rate Equity Act. Bonior, D-Mich., motion to order the previous question (thus ending debate and the possibility of amendment) on the rule (H Res 242) providing for House floor consideration of the bill to place a $720 per return limit on the 10 percent individual income tax cut scheduled for July 1, 1983. Motion agreed to 255-165: Y(2-3-0), June 23, 1983.

203. H.R. 1183. Tax Rate Equity Act. Adoption of the rule (H Res 242) providing for House floor consideration of the bill to place a $720 per return limit on the 10 percent individual income tax cut scheduled for July 1, 1983. Adopted 253-166: Y(2-3-0), June 23, 1983.

204. H. Con. Res. 91. First Budget Resolution, Fiscal 1984. Jones, D-Okla., motion to approve the substitute resolution, agreed to by House-Senate conferees but reported in technical disagreement, to set budget targets for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, as follows (totals including reserve fund items in parenthesis): budget authority, $919.5 billion ($928.725 billion); outlays $849.5 billion, ($858.925 billion); deficit, $169. ($179.925 billion). The resolution also sets preliminary goals for fiscal 1985-86, revised budget levels for fiscal 1983, and included reconciliation instructions requiring House and Senate committees to recommend legislative savings to meet the budget targets. Motion agreed to 239-186: Y(2-3-0), June 23, 1983.

205. H.R. 1183. Tax Rate Equity Act. McCurdy, D-Okla., amendment to call for a reduction in fiscal 1984 spending by at least the amount that is expected to be raised by placing a $720 per return limit on the individual income tax cut scheduled for July 1, 1983. Adopted 267-155: Y(2-3-0), June 23, 1983.

206. H.R. 1183. Tax Rate Equity Act. Frenzel, R-Minn., motion to recommit the bill to the Ways and Means Committee with instructions to strike the $720 tax-cut limit and replace it with language calling for legislation to reduce fiscal 1984 spending by at least $12 billion. Motion rejected 181-241: N(2-3-0), June 23, 1983.

207. H.R. 1183. Tax Rate Equity Act. Passage of the bill to place a $720 per return limit on the 10 percent individual income tax cut scheduled for July 1, 1983. Passed 229-191: Y(2-3-0), June 23, 1983.

208. H.R. 3132. Energy and Water Development Appropriations, Fiscal 1984. Conte, R-Mass., motion to instruct conferees on the fiscal 1984 energy and water development appropriations bill to insist on the House position not including funds for construction on the Garrison Diversion unit in North Dakota. Motion rejected 150-215: N(0-4-1), June 23, 1983.

210. H.R. 3363. Interior Appropriations, Fiscal 1984. Hiler, R-Ind., amendments offered en bloc to reduce appropriations in the bill for the National Endowment for the Arts and National Endowment for the Humanities by $40 million, returning them to fiscal 1983 levels. Rejected 150-271: N(3-2-0), June 28, 1983.

211. H.R. 3363. Interior Appropriations, Fiscal 1984. McDade, R-Pa., amendment to reduce program funding contained in the bill by 4 percent across-the-board, with certain exceptions. Adopted 211-209: N(3-2-0), June 28, 1983. (This amendment subsequently was defeated after the House rose from the Committee of the Whole).

212. H.R. 3363. Interior Appropriations, Fiscal 1984. McDade, R-Pa., amendment to reduce program funding contained in the bill by 4 percent across-the-board, with certain exceptions. Rejected 206-213: N(3-2-0), June 28, 1983. (This amendment previously had been adopted in the Committee of the Whole).

213. H.R. 3363. Interior Appropriations, Fiscal 1984. Passage of the bill to appropriate $8,081,974,000 for the Interior Department and related agencies in fiscal 1984. Passed 272-144: Y(4-1-0), June 28, 1983. The president had requested $6,700,928,000 in new budget authority.

214. H.R. 3398. Omnibus Minor Tariff Amendments. Gibbons, D-Fla., motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill to make 23 minor changes in tariff and customs laws. Motion agreed to 368-43: Y(3-2-0), June 28, 1983. A two-thirds majority of those present and voting (274 in this case) is required for passage under suspension of the rules.

215. H.R. 3133. Department of Housing and Urban Development Appropriations, Fiscal 1984. Adoption of the conference report on the bill to appropriate $55,789,340,000 for the Department of Housing and Urban Development and 17 independent agencies in fiscal 1984. Adopted 314-99: Y(3-2-0), June 29, 1983. The president had requested $49,561,458,896 in new budget authority.

216. H. Res. 245. Hearing Transcript Investigation. Wright, D-Texas, motion to refer to the Rules Committee the resolution to create a select committee to investigate alterations of hearing transcripts. Motion agreed to 265-161: Y(2-3-0), June 29, 1983.

217. H.R. 3135. Legislative Branch Appropriations, Fiscal 1984. Adoption of the conference report on the bill to appropriate $1,473,359,000 for Congress and its agencies in fiscal 1984. Adopted 241-175: Y(3-2-0), June 29, 1983. The president had requested $1,473,395,000 in new budget authority. Traditionally, the president simply requests the amount congressional agencies want included in the budget.

218. H.R. 3132. Energy and Water Development Appropriations, Fiscal 1984. Adoption of the conference report on the bill to appropriate $14, energy and water development in fiscal 1984. Adopted 337-82: Y(5-0-0), June 29, 1983. The president had requested $14,610,671,000 in new budget authority.

219. H.R. 3415. District of Columbia Appropriations, Fiscal 1984. Passage of the bill to appropriate $544,590,000 in federal funds for the District of Columbia in fiscal 1984, and $2,122,013,000 in funds for the district's own treasury. Passed 296-124: Y(2-3-0), June 29, 1983.

220. H.R. 2668. Consumer Product Safety Act Authorization. Shelby, D-Ala., substitute to authorize $35.7 million for the Consumer Product P Commission in fiscal 1984, $37.485 million in fiscal 1985 and $39.36 million in fiscal 1986. Adopted 238-177: N(3-2-0), June 29, 1983. (The bill, as amended, subsequently was passed by voice vote.)

221. H. Res. 254. Hearing Transcript Investigation. Long, D-La., motion to order the previous question (thus ending debate and the possibility of an amendment) on the resolutions to authorize the Committee on Standards of Offiicial Conduct to begin an investigation of alleged alterations of hearing transcripts. Motion agreed to 250-151: Y(2-3-0), June 30, 1983.

222. H. Res. 254. Hearing Transcript Investigation. Adoption of the resolution to authorize the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to begin an investigation of alleged alterations of hearing transcripts. Adopted 409-0: Y(5-0-0), June 30, 1983.

223. H.R. 1. Housing and Urban-Rural Recovery Act. Adoption of the rule (H. Res. 248) providing for House floor consideration of the bill to authorize $24.6 billion for the Department of Housing and Urban Development in fiscal 1984. Adopted 291-110: Y(2-3-0), June 30, 1983.

224. H. Con. Res. 126. Harry S. Truman Centennial Commemoration. Adoption of the concurrent resolution providing for the commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of the late President Harry S. Truman. Adopted 382-5: Y(5-0-0), June 30, 1983.

225. S. 273. Small Business Pilot Programs. Adoption of the conference report on the bill to authorize in fiscal 1984-85 two minority enterprise pilot programs conducted by the Small Business Administration. Adopted (thus cleared for the President) 367-6: Y(5-0-0), June 30, 1983.

226. H.R. 10. National Development Investment Act. Walker, R-Pa., amendment to require the secretary of commerce to study whether adhering to federal rules or regulations affecting funding in the bill, such as the Davis-Bacon Act requiring that prevailing local wages be paid on federal construction projects, would reduce job opportunities in affected areas of the country. Rejected 170-245: N(3-2-0), July 12, 1983.

227. H.R. 10. National Development Investment Act. Walker, R-Pa., amendment to permit the secretary of commerce, upon application by an Economic Development Administration grant recipient, to waive federal rules or regulations affecting funding in the bill, such as the Davis-Bacon Act requiring that prevailing local wages be paid on federal construction projects, if the waiver would increase job opportunities in the affected area. Rejected 148-270: N(3-2-0), July 12, 1983.

228. H.R. 10. National Development Investment Act. Passage of the bill to authorize $500 million in each of fiscal years 1984-86 for Economic Development Administration grants to state and local governments and other entities to foster economic development by improving roads, bridges and other infrastructure items and by making loans to save or start small businesses; and to authorize continued funding for Appalachian Regional Commission projects at various levels in fiscal years 1984-91. Passed 306-113: Y(2-3-0), July 12, 1983. A "nay" was a vote supporting the president's position.

229. H.R. 1. Housing and Urban-Rural Recovery Act. Wylie, R-Ohio, amendment to prevent federal funds for a new $900 million multifamily rental housing production program from going to areas or communities that place rent control on projects built after the date of enactment. Rejected 206-208: N(3-2-0), July 12, 1983.

231. H.R. 1. Housing and Urban-Rural Recovery Act. Bartlett, R-Texas, amendment to allow the interest rates on Federal Home insured mortgage loans to be negotiated between the lender and the buyer. Adopted 223-201: N(3-2-0), July 13, 1983. (This amendment subsequently was adopted after the House rose from the Committee of the Whole.)

232. H.R. 1. Housing and Urban-Rural Recovery Act. Bartlett, R-Texas, amendment to eliminate $900 million for a new multifamily rental rehabilitation program and $167 million for the Section 235 homeownership program for low and moderate income people and transfer the money to the Section 8 rental assistance program for existing housing. Rejected 120-300: N(2-3-0), July 13, 1983.

233. H.R. 1. Housing and Urban-Rural Recovery Act. STRONG AND IMMEDIATE ACTION NEEDED TO CONTROL GOVERNMENT SPENDING

HON. JERRY M. PATTERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my deep concern over the growing deficit crisis and to request the support of my colleagues for a constitutional amendment that will require the President's submission and the Congress approval of a balanced budget.

We cannot go on borrowing and financing annual deficits of nearly $200 billion indefinitely. The stability of our economy is severely affected by huge deficits. To finance the current deficit, the Federal Government must borrow almost 60 percent of all private savings, money which would normally be available for lending and investment in the United States. As we continue to borrow, interest rates will continue to rise, leading to sluggish business investment, minimal improvements in productivity, slower economic growth, as well as reduced tax revenues. Higher interest rates will ultimately choke off the recovery and put us back on the downward path to economic stagnation.

Every year that we continue to incur massive budget deficits, the size of our national debt increases. In 1982, our national debt passed the trillion dollar mark. Under the current Reagan administration policies, this debt will approach $3 trillion in 1988. The interest we pay on the national debt increases by approximately $8 billion each year the deficit remains at its present level and now accounts for nearly 13 percent of all Federal spending.

Since World War II, Federal budget deficits have been largely a function of economic conditions and have been a relatively small proportion of the gross national product. For the most part, deficits were viewed as temporary problems and not as a severe threat to the economy. Since President Reagan assumed office, however, budget deficits have been anything but small, totaling 7 percent of the GNP in 1983, compared to only 1.2 percent in 1973. We now borrow 27 percent of our Federal budget, compared to a cumulative 4-year total of 9.5 percent under the Carter administration.

In the last few years, it appears that deficits are no longer considered temporary problems. In fact, deficit spending has become an almost acceptable norm in the Federal Government. For example, of all President Reagan's proposed budgets submitted to Congress, not one has even been close to being balanced. The President's budget proposals have requested deficit spending escalating upward every year from the $45 billion requested for fiscal 1982 to the $180.4 billion requested for fiscal 1985.

Neither the President nor the Congress appears willing to make any tough and perhaps politically unpopular decisions to substantially reduce the deficit, especially in an election year. Without a forceful legislative measure to control the budget, the current fiscal policy we now have will not be corrected. We cannot put off these decisions any longer. We must start closing the gap between Government spending and Government income if this deficit crisis is to be solved and the strength of the American economy maintained. We must tackle this deficit crisis head on even if special interest groups initially oppose our efforts.

Mr. Speaker, what I am soliciting today is the support of the leadership and my colleagues for a constitutional amendment to balance the Federal budget which I introduced during the first session of the 98th Congress. I will admit that in the past I have had reservations about altering our Nation's Constitution to deal with budgetary crises. I had hoped that we here in Washington, representing the American people, could put our bipartisan differences aside and work toward resolving this deficit crisis without harsh measures. Recordbreaking deficits, however, have necessitated this drastic course of action.

Many bills have been introduced over the years in support of a balanced budget amendment. However, all of them have lacked one or more provisions which I believe are essential if we are going to address this problem in a direct but reasonable manner.

Let me highlight those provisions included in my proposed amendment, House Joint Resolution 428, which, when taken together, uniquely address the deficit problem:

House Joint Resolution 428 would require not only that Congress enact a balanced budget but, additionally, that the President prepare and submit a balanced budget to Congress. Since assuming office, President Reagan has yet to submit a balanced budget to Congress. Omitting the President from the balanced budget process is unrealistic. The President is responsible for preparing the Federal budget and presenting it to Congress for approval;

House Joint Resolution 428 also insures that our Federal Government's commitment to national defense will not be breached. To provide flexibility to respond to threats and emergencies affecting our national security interests, my amendment allows suspension of the balanced budget requirement in the event of a national emergency or declaration of war; and Unlike other balanced budget amendments introduced in the past, House Joint Resolution 428 would go into effect immediately upon ratification by the States. Delaying actual enactment of the amendment only allows a President more time to slip unbalanced budgets past the American people, something our economy simply cannot withstand at this point.

Those of us who really believe the economy is in trouble and that deficits do matter, should be the first to press for passage of this amendment. We must gain control over budget deficits now. We can no longer postpone any all-out effort to reduce the deficit until after the election.

This Government's growing deficits are disastrous to our economic system and are completely unacceptable to the American people. A constitutional amendment demonstrates our resolve to force Government to live within its means. This legislation is needed to make sure intentions of a balanced budget are realized. If the administration is not willing to make some difficult decisions, we in Congress must find the solutions. A balanced budget amendment is a positive step in that direction.●

MR. REAGAN, WE WANT SPECIFICS

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, in the March 29 New York Times, President Reagan made it very clear that he intends to restructure social security benefits if he is reelected. He did not, however, make clear the specifics of this restructuring.

What kind of restructuring can the elderly and the workers of America expect from a man whose definition of the truly needy is shockingly narrow, one of whose advisers publicly declares that there is no hunger in America?

Mr. Reagan talked about political demagoguery used to frighten the elderly. It sounds like demagoguery to me that Reagan is now talking about restructuring the social security program but he's going to wait until after the election, he's going to wait until after he has his votes safely in his pocket.

Mr. Reagan gives no specifics, hiding behind the excuse that this will take thorough study. Of course totally revamping the system will take thorough study. That's what the Presidential Commission on Social Security was for: to thoroughly study the program, then make recommendations to Congress. After a year of study and hearings, the Commission made these recommendations, Congress acted on them, the final legislation was signed by Mr. Reagan last year. If the amendments to the system that we all agonized over last year were not thorough, then what do you have in mind, specifically, Mr. Reagan?●

NUCLEAR CRISIS CONTROL

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, the grave danger posed by nuclear weapons is unlikely soon to pass. As long as mankind is saddled with these weapons, however, it must make every effort to reduce their danger. Controlling the number of nuclear powers in the world, and the weapons held by those powers, may be the most important of such efforts. It is also necessary that a rough balance of retaliatory nuclear power be maintained, so that no nation initiates a holocaust in the belief that surprise might yield conquest.

These efforts are not guaranteed to succeed. While arms control limits the hardware of destruction, and deterrence seeks to eliminate any rational motivation for using that hardware, risks are still posed by the weapons that continue to exist and the human potential for irrational action that might put those weapons into use. And if weapons fell into the wrong hands, irresponsible terrorism could ignite a general nuclear exchange.

Interest has therefore grown in measures that reduce the chance of inadvertent nuclear war. In an international crisis, our greatest peril may come from the strain placed on the individuals in charge of national security, on their sources of accurate information, and on their ability to communicate with one another. We should try to mitigate these dangers and allow our leaders to cool nuclear crises before they boil over.

I urge my colleagues to read and consider a recent article that explains the concept of crisis control, and offers concrete recommendations that could make our world a more secure place to live. Its author, Dr. William Ury, directs the nuclear negotiation project at Harvard University and is a recognized expert in his field. While his article merely introduces the subject of crisis control, and his proposals require further discussion and refinement, the protection of peace in our age is too important for us to ignore such constructive advice.

The article follows:

WHAT WE CAN DO TO AVERT NUCLEAR WAR

(By William L. Ury)

Nuclear war can happen two ways: by cool calculation or by runaway escalation. The public debate and official discussions dwell mostly on war by design. Yet, unintended war through the uncontrolled escalation of a crisis is by far the more likely scenario. To prevent nuclear war, we need arms control; but just as much, we need crisis control.

Today, the United States and the Soviet Union each marshaled enormous military forces poised to strike. Fearing total mutual destruction, the two sides are talking, but gingerly, suspiciously, and sometimes very little. The truce has lasted more than 30 years, but at any moment an accident, a miscalculation or a regional conflict could trigger the war no one wants.

Fascinated by the awesome destructiveness of a nuclear bomb, we have focused on the weapons themselves. Should we freeze them? Should we reduce them? Should we even increase them? Yet, with 50,000 weapons in the arsenals, even a radical reduction to half would not save us if war broke out. It would take only a few hundred to destroy America, if not the world.

The greatest danger now is not the weapons, but people making mistakes. We can stabilize the weaponry so that no sane leader deliberately starts a nuclear war, but, in times of intense crisis, miscommunication, miscalculation, stupidity, panic and organizational snafus?

Too many paths exist by which an unexpected nuclear crisis could erupt—and they are gradually multiplying. The superpowers could become embroiled in their friends' wars, as in the Middle East. Missiles might be fired by accident or without authorization. A "mad" leader with a few atomic bombs, believing that his nation or terrorist group would be better off without the superpowers, might detonate a bomb in an American city, hoping thereby to trigger a Soviet-American exchange. Perhaps most dangerous is the scenario no one foresees.

The most serious threat in such a crisis is not to American and Soviet military capabilities, but to each side's capacity to make wise decisions. To improve that capacity is the task of "crisis control."

The existing Washington-Moscow hotline (first proposed in the pages of Parade) is one important step for crisis control. But we need to build further on its success.

In September 1982, the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency asked a group of specialists at Harvard, including Dr. Richard Smoke and myself, to study past U.S.-Soviet crisis and to suggest better ways of controlling them. We asked ourselves: If you were an American (or Soviet) leader as a crisis broke out, what would you wish you had discussed beforehand with the other side so as to ensure both sides reached a wise decision? Let me describe three crisis control measures our report suggested for the government's consideration.

CRISIS CONTROL CENTER

If a nuclear bomb suddenly destroyed San Francisco, American suspicions would fasten immediately on the Soviet Union. Feelings of outrage, calls for immediate retaliation and expectations of further nuclear attacks might drive the world toward war. But the bomb might have been detonated by a terrorist group, a third nation or even by accident. In such cases, American leaders would want proof, and the Soviets would surely want to cooperate. No one would want to go to war over a mistaken assumption.

The hotline might be inadequate for the delicate tasks of interpreting and authenticating information. We would be much safer if there existed a group of highly trained military and diplomatic experts from both sides who knew each other and had prepared intensively together for just such a crisis. Hence the usefulness of a U.S.-Soviet crisis control center with headquarters in Washington and Moscow, each staffed around the clock with American and Soviet experts.

Even better than crisis control is crisis prevention. At such a center, the United States and the Soviet Union could share intelligence and even act jointly to prevent nuclear terrorism or a nuclear attack from a third nation. It is not only possible; it has already been done. In August 1977, the Soviets tipped off the U.S. government that South Africa was planning to test a nuclear device. A strong but quiet American protest followed; and no test took place.

The center enjoys bipartisan support. The late Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington proposed the idea almost two years ago, and Sens. Sam Nunn of Georgia and John Warner of Virginia recently released a report urging the Reagan Administration again to consider such a center.

No idea is without problems. A crisis center could be misused for intelligence gathering or deceiving the other side. Clearly the arrangement should not depend on goodwill, for we are engaged with the Soviets in a global contest involving strong, conflicting interests. But, as Senator Nunn said: "You don't have to trust the Russians to do this; you only need to make an assumption that they are not madmen and they will act in their own interests."

PRESIDENTIAL CRISIS CONTROL EXERCISE

The most important decision that the President of the United States would ever make would come during a severe crisis with the Soviet Union. The fate of billions may rest on his decision. There is, moreover, no second chance. Yet the President receives very little preparation for his critical role in controlling a nuclear confrontation.

Perhaps the simplest way to pass on the lessons of past crises and to prepare for future ones would be for the President to immerse himself, possibly over a long weekend, with his closest advisers. National security experts and former government officials with experience in crises could brief the President. The participants might also engage in a "crisis game," a simulation of an emerging U.S.-Soviet confrontation. If a crisis were later to break out, those three days might be the most valuable weekend the President—or anyone—ever spent.

INCIDENTS IN THE AIR AGREEMENT

The terrible downing of Korean Air Lines Flight 007 six months ago raises several sobering "what ifs." What if the Soviets had attacked an American airplane? What if the attack had come during a time of acute international tension?

Could this trigger a war? Unlikely. Is it possible? Yes. World War I began with the assassination of Austrian Archduke Ferdinand at Sarajevo in June 1914. Today, as two hostile superpowers confront each other around the globe, the potential accidental triggers multiply. How can we create safety mechanisms to avoid a nuclear Sarajevo?

In 1972, concerned by the growing number of collisions and near-misses between American and Soviet naval vessels, the two navies reached an agreement on ship-to-ship signals for avoiding and coping with these dangerous incidents. Under this Incidents at Sea Agreement, naval officers from both nations meet every six months to review the process. This low-profile professional communication goes on even at times of high tension. Many fear that we cannot work with the Russians. The truth is we already are doing so.

Why not an Incidents in the Air Agreement to prevent and cope with accidental foreign intrusions into national airspace? Even given Soviet paranoia and blunders, these agreed emergency procedures might have prevented the Korean Air Lines disaster.

The superpowers could extend these procedures to cover other possible accidental triggers as well. In a nuclear armed world, this seems the height of common sense.

The center, the Presidential exercise and the agreed emergency procedures, together with the hotline, would constitute a comprehensive crisis control system much as our fire departments and fire safety regulations make up a fire control system. Just as fire controls are not guarantees against fires, however, so crisis controls are not guarantees against critical confrontations. Rather, they are small, practical steps that can reduce the risk.

Such steps are politically feasible. The superpowers both want to eliminate the risk of accidental war; and crisis control does not evoke the fears of military inferiority that stymie the arms talks.

The time is right; interest is growing. Last summer, the U.S. government started discussions with the Soviets on improving the hotline. Now we need to go beyond the hotline.

In a metaphorical sense, all humanity was aboard the Korean airliner. We are all passengers on a fragile craft, vulnerable to sophisticated technological attack, the possible consequences of miscalculation, fears, miscommunication and outright blunders.

The passengers on KAL 007 had no idea what hit them. We, however, can now see what might hit us. A runaway crisis is the greatest nuclear danger today. Crisis control is our greatest opportunity to reduce that danger. And it has ties within our grasp. There is still time for the world to step back from the brink.●

PAYROLL DEDUCTION FACILITATION ACT

HON. FERNAND J. ST GERMAIN

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, on April 2, 1984, the House passed H.R. 3879, the Payroll Deduction Facilitation Act. The bill, which was introduced by our distinguished colleague, the gentlelady from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR), allows Federal employees to request that up to three deductions or allotments from their paychecks be sent to financial institutions at no cost to the employee or the designated financial institution. This is a distinct improvement over current law which charges the financial institution (and ultimately, the employee) for the administrative costs of processing two out of the three payroll deductions.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3879 was jointly referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. The Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits of the Post Office Committee reported out H.R. 3879 deleting a provision which would have amended the Right to Financial Privacy Act of 1978. With the deletion of that provision, H.R. 3879 is substantially similar to H.R. 4703, as amended, which was unanimously reported out of the Banking Committee and passed by the House under suspension on April 27, 1982.

H.R. 3879 promotes savings and thrift, corrects an inequity against the Federal civilian employee that has existed for far too long, and ends a burdensome billing practice which is not cost effective.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlelady from Ohio is to be commended for her leadership and diligence in bringing this matter again to our attention. I am encouraged by the administration's support of this legislation and would encourage our colleagues in the Senate to promptly pass the bill.●

WILL ON JERUSALEM EMBASSY CONTROVERSY

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to enter into the RECORD a column in the April 9, 1984 edition of Newsweek entitled "Power, Politics and the Embassy."

In this column George Will, in his own inimitable style, addresses some of the arguments which have been offered against moving our Embassy to Israel's chosen capital and leaves these arguments looking pretty lame. The Embassy issue may not be the most important foreign policy question of the year, but our handling of it is the most important policy statement this country will have to make. Will we cave in to threats of "Islamic extremism" or will we, as Will challenges, stand tall?

The column follows:

POWER, POLITICS AND THE EMBASSY

(By George F. Will)

In the controversy about where the U.S. Embassy in Israel should be located, both sides have been asking for trouble in loud voices. Trouble is something fate has a way of furnishing with a lavish hand.

Since the founding of Israel, the U.S. Embassy has been in Tel Aviv. Israel says its capital is Jerusalem. Israel alone among nations is denied by other nations the right to stipulate its capital. Now Sen. Pat Moynihan has 37 cosponsors for his bill to move the embassy and ambassador's residence to Jerusalem, and Rep. Tom Lantos, Democrat of California, has 213 cosponsors for an identical bill. Secretary of State George Shultz opposes the bills on three grounds, only one of which seems strong.

Shultz says moving the embassy "would be taken" as a prejudgment of "one of the key issues"—the status of Jerusalem—"which must be freely negotiated between the parties" and might fatally damage U.S. credibility as "peacemaker." But there is only one other party with the slightest claim to Jerusalem. It is Jordan, which after 36 years of refusing all negotiations with Israel has forfeited its right to consideration. And King Hussein has recently expressed his disdain for the United States as peacemaker.

Shultz says moving the embassy would "fan Islamic extremism" and perhaps provoke mob violence against U.S. personnel and facilities. But U.S. policy is not a thermostat capable of controlling Islamic extremism, which will continue to rage against the United States no matter what U.S. policy is. And it is well to remember this: one reason there is a Reagan administration is that the previous administration was perceived as weak when dealing with mobs and an embassy in the Middle East.

Policy: More importantly, Shultz says the Moynihan and Lantos bills improperly infringe on the president's "exclusive constitutional responsibilities to conduct diplomacy and to determine the country's recognition policy." But this is not a recognition question comparable to extending or denying diplomatic recognition to a nation. Congress would be compelling the president only to abandon a chimera and to conform policy to an incontrovertible fact. The chimera is the belief that the status of Jerusalem is negotiable. The fact is that Jerusalem is Israel's capital. Ask a random sample of Americans to name the capitals of, say, Delaware, Vermont and Israel. More will know Jerusalem than Dover or Montpelier.

The proposal to move the embassy is designed to nip in the bud a noxious growth. Israel's enemies have taken to stressing that even west Jerusalem is "occupied territory." Now, the correct (that is, my) position on the embassy is wine too strong for the likes of Hart and Mondale. It is: move the embassy to east Jerusalem, the part captured when Jordan attacked in 1967. That would express, emphatically, the fact that the 19-year division of Jerusalem was an accident of the 1948 armistice, and the unification of Jerusalem 17 years ago is irreversible. Perhaps in the late 1940s it was possible to believe that negotiations could produce concord about Jerusalem. Today it is not possible. No visible or anticipatable Arab government will countenance a united Jerusalem under Israeli sovereignty, and no conceivable Israeli government will consider anything less. When a subject is, on every side, nonnegotiable, it is imprudent to pretend otherwise.

The issue of moving the embassy suits Mondale's taste for a foreign policy long on moral poses and short on more tangible forms of power. And it fits his "cafeteria politics," whereby groups are invited to Walter's Restaurant to fill their trays from a rich selection of dishes for every appetite. Hart could have used this issue to underscore his advertised reluctance to leap through hoops at the command of particular constituencies. Instead, he did an ungainly somersault through the hoop. He changed his position to support the move and blamed his earlier opposition on his staff, as usual. Reagan's threat to veto any bill mandating movement of the embassy is misguided policy, but is at least manly. (And it probably will cause Moynihan and Lantos to try to pass only a nonbinding resolution.)

National Pride: It sometimes seems that the foreign policy of the Democratic left is that the United States should be only strong and assertive enough to defend Israel. Imagine the dismay and contempt among Israel's leaders as they watch Hart and Mondale scramble for Jewish votes. In New York both divided their time between promising to move the embassy and vying to see who could seem most horrified by any use of U.S. power. The safety of Israel depends not at all on moving the embassy 47 miles. It depends considerably on the credibility of U.S. power. Such credibility is a small part of the foreign-policy calculations of Hart and Mondale.

They are trying to evict an administration that prides itself on realism and the restoration of national pride. Yet the administration has unrealistic hopes for negotiations and an undignified eagerness to make preemptive concessions to Arab mobs. Reagan has a remarkable capacity to have a ceiling cave in on him without it leaving so much as a flake of plaster in his hair. The Lebanon debacle seems not to have damaged him. But that was another instance in which it was safer to be America's enemy than its friend. The Moynihan-Lantos effort is an opportunity for the United States to say: we know our friends, and with them we stand.

In August 1980, the United Nations demanded that the 13 nations with embassies in Jerusalem remove them. They did, but one, Costa Rica, has returned to Jerusalem. Some persons will say: Costa Rica can do that because it does not aspire to be an impartial mediator in the region. But impartiality is not a worthy aspiration for the United States where Israel is concerned. The most important reason for moving the embassy is not to serve Israel's security, but to serve the American spirit. The mere fact that nations are presuming to dictate where a U.S. Embassy can be is a sufficient reason for adhering to Nelson's fire-poker principle. Admiral Nelson said: "It matters not at all in what way I lay this poker on the floor. But if Bonaparte shall say it must be placed in this direction, we must instantly insist upon its being laid in some other one." Call it standing tall.●

OUTSTANDING CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE FIELD OF ENTERTAINMENT

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize three constituents of mine for their outstanding contributions to the field of entertainment. Thomas McDonald Small III, Joseph James Gladmond, and Homeretta M. Ayala, all members of the Dundalk Community Theatre (DCT), who will be honored this Thursday evening, April 5, 1984, at a surprise buffet dinner.

The individual involvement of these three people with the theatrical community is so extensive that it would be impossible thoroughly to describe it here. However, I would like to mention a few highlights of their careers.

Mick Small, currently director of the DCT, has been an active DCT member since its beginning. In addition to serving as vice-president of production on the board of directors of DCT, Mr. Small teaches acting and directs the productions of ACT I, the Performing Arts Program at Dundalk Community College. Mr. Small studied acting at Towson State University and holds a masters degree from The Johns Hopkins University. When not directing or acting, Mr. Small works in the Baltimore County School System.

Joe Gladmond, presently the choreographer for DCT, began his dance training in Baltimore at an early age and later studied dance in New York. Mr. Gladmond has appeared professionally on and off Broadway and his wide range of abilities has been demonstrated by his performances in over 40 musicals as well as dramas and operas. He has choreographed over 20 DCT productions and is the dance instructor for ACT I.

Homeretta Ayala, musical director for DCT, received her bachelors of music education from Florida State University and her masters degree from Towson State University. Included in her credits are more than 20 Broadway musicals and shows. In addition to serving as music director of ACT I, she is also choral director at Sparrows Point Senior High school and music director at Perry Hall Presbyterian Church. She has directed choirs and instrumental groups in Florida, the Virgin Islands, Pennsylvania, and Maryland.

Dundalk Community Theatre has been an important entertainment center in my district for many years, providing first-rate shows for my younger constituents and their families. I commend Mr. Small, Mr. Gladmond, and Ms. Ayala for their long and dedicated involvement with the Dundalk Community Theatre and join their friends, families, and appreciative audiences in wishing them many more years of successful performances.●

IN THEIR WORDS

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. LEHMAN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the month of April is the special time of remembrance and commemoration of those who perished in the Holocaust. As Yom Hashoa approaches, I would like to bring to my colleagues' attention the work that is now taking place to record oral history by those who survived the Holocaust.

The South Florida Holocaust Memorial Center has undertaken an extremely important oral history project. The center has recorded over 250 first-person testimonies, and has produced a film designed to educate the public and provide educational material to address the omission of this dark side of history from our history textbooks. The award winning film, "In Their Words," was produced by the center along with a 59-page teaching guide for students. A recent Miami Herald article entitled "Holocaust Center Takes Memories Into Classrooms" describes the center and its vital work. I would like to commend the center on its efforts, and I wish to share the article with my colleagues:

HOLOCAUST CENTER TAKES MEMORIES INTO CLASSROOMS

(By Ellen Livingston)

The most vivid recollection before the actual hanging is that the Germans had somehow rigged up some sort of a walkway that was stone and there were very sharp edges, and the men were made to crawl on their knees over this . . . By the time they actually hanged them, we were glad. . . .

I remember my mother trying to shield my eyes so I wouldn't watch. And there was a German standing next to her, and he jerked her hand away, and he said, 'Let her see.' It's hardly something I'm ever going to forget."

The words, said without tears by a Miami resident, recount the kind of story that died with most of the victims of the Nazi Holocaust. But these few sentences, at least, have been termed "A Living Memorial through Education": they have been permanently recorded on videotape by the Southeastern Florida Holocaust Memorial Center.

They have also been passed onto hundreds of Dade County high schoolers, who have seen 30-minute highlights of those videotapes in a film called In Their Words.

The four-year-old center, located at Florida International University's Bay Vista Campus, has recorded more than 250 first-person testimonies from survivors of the Nazi persecution, from their protectors—men and women who sheltered the victims from the Nazis—and from their liberators—the Allied soldiers who freed victims from concentration and death camps in 1945.

But center officials decided a year ago that a manageable compilation was needed if the stories were ever to be shared with the South Florida public. So they produced In Their Words, which splices the testimonies with archival footage.

The idea, says executive vice president Goldie R. Goldstein, is to educate the South Florida public through the words of South Florida survivors. "That's a tremendous thing," she says. "The teacher can say to them, 'These people are your neighbors. They're not just fictional characters.'" The film won the Mass Media Award of the National Conference of Christians and Jews last February.

Frustrated by what they saw as a lack of exposure in the classroom to the Holocaust, Goldstein and other center workers last year oganized a countywide conference for high school teachers to help them use In Their Words in the classroom.

The conference included a 59-page teacher's guide prepared by the Central Agency for Jewish Education, supplying the teachers with everything from a history of anti-Semitism to a glossary of words from Auschwitz to Yellow Badge.

"The report has come back to use that it's a very positive and very intellectual reaction" from students, Goldstein says. "We're not looking just to show them atrocities in the concentration camps. We're looking to raise their consciousness."

Miriam Gersten, chairwoman of the social studies department at North Miami Beach High, says the school has frequently used In Their Words in American and European history classes. "It's a good teaching tool," she says. "I don't think that text books can do justice to the Holocaust."

The center is also hoping to boost Holocaust awareness in the classroom with a statewide gathering of survivors and educators it is cosponsoring with the Miami-based Zachor Institute Feb. 26 and 27. Titled "The Holocaust: Reality of the Past, Implications for the Future," it will include lectures and exhibits designed to educate teachers on the topic, says Marc Pollick, Zachor's executive director.

Though In Their Words has been successful, Goldstein says the center's ultimate mission still is recording every Holocaust story it can. That, she says, is as much a part of its purpose as an educational institution as getting In Their Words into the classroom.

Although it's a long and taxing process—It can take up to a year for each tape to be transcribed and bound—Goldstein insists it's a job that needs to be done. She quotes the director of the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem, who has counted more than 100 books in seven languages denying that the Holocaust ever took place.

As survivors die, Goldstein says, it becomes all the more important for the story to be passed on. "The most critical factor here is that if we ever forget, we could live to see it happen again," she says quietly. "The future generations must know that the Holocaust occurred. There's too much effort and too much money being spent denying it."●

TRIBUTE TO JULIA AND GEORGE HERMANN

HON. ROBERT G. TORRICELLI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. TORRICELLI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to one of my hometown's proudest families and most dedicated servants. Julia and George Hermann of New Milford, N.J. represent the ideal of family unity and community service. On April 28, the Hermann's will be honored by the New Milford Jewish Center for their years of unending labor to the synagogue and world Jewry.

Together, the Hermann's have naturally risen to leadership in every endeavor they have joined. George is the president of Manufacturers Aid, Inc., of Jersey City, and Julia just recently retired from years of public service with the Social Security Administration. In the Jewish community of New Milford, there is no organization that has not been graced by their guidance, energy, and generosity.

The Hermann's philanthropy, in personal effort as well as finance, sets a standard matched by few. They stand as a model for not only their two daughters and three grandchildren, but for all those who are touched by caring and commitment.

I am proud to honor them on the floor of the U.S. Congress and offer them as a symbol of the dedication and duty which places our Nation ahead of all others. My congratulations go forth to the Hermann's for their lifetime of accomplishment.●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR SOVIET JEWS

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the plight of Soviet Jewry has reached frightening dimensions. For the first time in a decade, emigration levels for Soviet Jews seeking to leave the Soviet Union for countries that respect the fundamental liberties of speech, religion, political beliefs and press have reached an alltime low.

Mr. Speaker, as a participant in this year's Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil for Soviet Jews, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to this abhorrent fact and to urge them to join me in condemning the inhumane practices of the Soviet Union toward Soviet Jewry. I thank my colleague, Larry Coughlin of Pennsylvania, for his leadership in this area as this year's Chairman of the Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil and for the opportunity to address this important matter.

Last year, only 1,315 Soviet Jews were granted the freedom to leave Soviet borders behind them and seek a free life elsewhere. This drastic reduction compared to the emigration peak of 51,320 in 1979, should concern all those who value the importance of human rights.

However, mere statistics cannot convey the hurt and the pain experienced by the individual Soviet Jews that have been subjected to years of harassment. For this reason, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the case of Lev Elbert and his family, a Soviet refusenik since August 1976.

Lev and his wife Inna have repeatedly sought permission from the Soviet authorities to leave the Soviet Union with their 12-year-old son, Carmi, and join Inna's brother in Israel. They have consistently been denied this right purportedly because of Lev's military service in 1973–74. Allegedly, Lev had access to classified information while in the army. In reality, Lev served as a private in a construction batallion and the major assignment his batallion was given was to complete the construction of a swimming pool.

After having submitted their 1976 emigration application and thus declared their desire to leave Soviet life, the Elberts and their relatives have been subjected to harassment and imprisonment by Soviet authorities. In 1978, a Kiev newspaper even published a slanderous article accusing the Elberts of anti-Soviet activity and branding them "traitors" and "dirty dogs."

The beginning of 1980 brought some measure of hope for the Elberts when the Soviet OVIR declared that Lev Elbert would no longer be denied an exit visa on the grounds of having had prior access to classified information. But any hope was soon crushed when the OVIR proceeded to deny the emigration application because there was "insufficient kinship" in Israel, the Elberts' destination. The Elberts had submitted an invitation signed by Inna's brother in Israel.

In subsequent years, relatives have been beaten, the Elberts' house has been searched and ransacked by KGB agents, Lev's 80 books on Jewish culture and history were confiscated, and KGB agents even crashed Inna Elbert's birthday party and wrote down the names of everyone present.

Just last May, Lev was sentenced to a year in a labor camp after being charged with draft evasion. Furthermore, he was also charged with "drug dissemination" after the police broke into his house, planted a drug on his bookshelf, and then "discovered" the drug in a search. These charges were later dropped.

Lev Elbert now remains in a Soviet labor camp where conditions are so unbearable that he has, at times, threatened to commit suicide. His wife Inna continues to protest her family's plight through formal protests and hunger strikes. Their son has been frightened and harassed by Soviet authorities. And yet, the Elberts continue to hope and have faith that, some day, they can live in freedom and pursue their beliefs like normal human beings.

Mr. Speaker, the case of Lev Elbert and his family symbolizes the plight of thousands of Soviet Jews who have been made to suffer because they are Jewish. We must continue to closely monitor the cases of refuseniks such as Lev Elbert and continue to speak out against such abuses. We cannot tolerate situations in which the lives of human beings are made miserable because they refuse to adhere to a set standard of conduct and because they choose to practice liberties accorded to every human being regardless of race, color, creed or political beliefs.●

A TRIBUTE TO FOUR EAGLE SCOUTS FROM NORTH WINDHAM, MAINE

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in honoring four members of North Windham, Maine Troop 805 who received Eagle Scout Awards. The four, Christopher Davis, Jeffrey Lamb, Scott Aldrich, and Timothy Pride, should be commended for winning scouting's highest honor. While only 21 badges are required to gain the award, each earned well over that minimum.

Of the North Windham Scouts, Christopher Davis, 15, son of Mr. and Mrs. Allie Davis, has been assistant patrol leader, and senior patrol leader.

Jeffrey Lamb, 14, son of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Lamb, has held several leadership positions, including patrol leader and assistant patrol leader.

Scott Aldrich, 18, son of Mr. and Mrs. Galan Aldrich, has served as patrol leader, senior patrol leader, and junior assistant scoutmaster.

The 18-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. John Pride, Tim Pride, is assistant scoutmaster.

I commend their parents, friends, and Scout leaders for encouraging these young men in their pursuit of excellence. I wish the new Eagle Scouts continued success in the future.●

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BONDS

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, at the end of 1983, the House of Representatives lost an opportunity to vote on a critical tax reform package when the legislation became embroiled in a controversy over provisions to slow the burgeoning growth of Industrial Development Bonds, or IDB's. Currently the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee are working to prepare a tax bill—and provisions restricting the growth of IDB's—for floor action in 1984.

As a prelude to floor action, I believe it is worthwhile to review the somewhat stormy history of development bond growth and discuss some of the invisible effects of that growth on the National Treasury and on the tax-exempt market.

WHO INVENTED IDB'S?

Tax-exempt securities have traditionally been used by State and local governments to finance the construction of important public purpose facilities such as schools, roads, and hospitals. While use of tax-exempt bonds for private purposes such as construction of commercial and industrial facilities is not a new idea, it is only in recent years that IDB-style financing has taken off.

In 1936, Mississippi was the first State to raise funds for business facilities using the tax-exempt market. The State authorized cities and counties to raise funds to construct industrial buildings to lease to manufacturers, so long as the debt was secured by the full faith and credit of the issuing agency. Other States followed the Mississippi example, and the idea quickly spread to other parts of the country.

By the early sixties tax-exempt financing for business ventures had taken on a new twist—development bonds were secured not by the full faith and credit of the issuing government, but were backed by the property or receipts of the project being financed. Businesses of all sizes began participating in local development programs and by 1968 IDB's represented 10 percent of all long-term tax-exempt sales. As we entered the seventies, IDB's were a fixture in the marketplace, and resourceful issuers and underwriters began finding a variety of users for this specialized kind of financing.

CONGRESSIONAL ACTION

As the use of IDB's grew, so did the drain of revenues from the Federal Treasury. In 1967, alarmed by the growth of private purpose revenue bonds, the Treasury Department declared IDB's taxable. The ensuing controversy led to passage of the Revenue and Expenditure Control Act of 1968. Under the act, IDB's were deemed taxable unless they were of the small issue variety or were used to finance certain types of facilities such as waste disposal facilities, electric energy or gas facilities, airports, docks, wharves, trade centers, sports facilities, industrial parks and residential mortgage programs. Small issue IDB's were defined in the legislation to be those which were used for the acquisition, construction, or improvement of land or depreciable property. Dollar limits for the small issue exemption were imposed, though the limit could be calculated in two ways. If the total of the proposed issue plus outstanding IDB's used to finance facilities for a user in the same jurisdiction equaled $1 million or less, the issue could be tax exempt. Alternatively, tax exemption would apply when the face amount of the issue could be added to all capital expenditures by the user in the issuing jurisdiction over a 6-year period—3 years before and 3 years after the issuance of the bond under consideration—for a total less than $10 million.

Despite these changes, private purpose bonds—IDB's and student loan bonds—continued to grow tremendously in the late 1970's—from $6.2 billion in 1976 to $44 billion in 1982. The growth in IDB's alone went from $5.6 billion in 1975 to $33.3 billion in 1982.

In 1982, Congress tried once again to limit IDB growth with passage of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act (TEFRA). The act established new procedural and reporting requirements for IDB issuance, prohibited facilities using tax-exempt financing from also making use of liberal depreciation rules, and provided a December 31, 1986, sunset date for small issue IDB use. Congress also supported specific use limitations on IDB financing, including prohibitions on use for golf and country clubs, racetracks, massage parlors, racquet sports facilities, and hot tubs.

NEW CONCERNS: INVISIBLE AGAINST VISIBLE EFFECTS

In spite of congressional efforts to limit IDB proliferation and slow the resulting revenue loss, many still view the use of private purpose bonds as growing out of control. The Ways and Means Committee reports that the TEFRA rules "appear unlikely to impose adequate limits on the overall growth in the volume of private activity bonds." At the current rate, bonds for private purpose activities are predicted to grow to $106 billion by 1988. In the next 3 years, revenue loss from IDB's is expected to exceed $28 billion.

There is little disagreement that IDB financing has had visible good effects in many communities. Industrial parks, hotels, and shopping plazas, new jobs are all visible results of the tax subsidy provided through IDB's.

The tool of bond financing also gives local jurisdictions an opportunity to plan and manage economic development. Much good can come from a well conceived plan to diversify the local economic base through providing incentives for select businesses. The lower financing costs for IDB backed businesses may allow some marginal firms to operate profitably, contributing to job creation and enhancing the local economy.

There is also benefit to be had from local control, particularly when Federal budget cuts have made it increasingly difficult for local governments to fund worthwhile activities. Localities in many areas have been very innovative in leveraging dwindling public funds to create a strong private economy, and IDB's work well in such efforts.

However, we must also look beyond the visible good of IDB's to the invisible effect they have. What are the invisible effects that should concern policymakers?

First, as I have mentioned, is the drain on the national coffers. IDB financing is an open-ended program which drains the Federal Treasury in a very real way. Tax expenditures are hidden costs of government which are not subject to the rigorous oversight of the appropriations process. Because there are few limitations on the absolute level of IDB financing, we can look forward to continuing exponential growth in the revenue cost of private purpose financing. Particularly in a time of mounting Federal deficits, we need to be very careful about our expenses. For this reason, IDB growth should be controlled.

Second, we have to be careful of the impact of large volumes of bond issues on the tax-exempt market as a whole. In a simple supply-and-demand relationship, it is easy to perceive that if there is a great supply of tax-exempt securities with a relatively fixed number of investors, those who can benefit from a tax-exempt return, the investor is going to seek those securities with the highest return. Competition implies that the higher tax-exempt yield required to attract the marginal investor will have the impact throughout the market of raising the price of tax-exempt financing. In recent years, we have seen a dwindling spread between taxable and nontaxable yields on long-term securities—in fact, some argue that the volume of IDB's can be directly attributed as the cause of rising yields, and thus higher costs for municipalities, across the tax-exempt market.

Third, IDB's no longer provide a single locality with additional leverage to attract businesses. When virtually every locality utilizes the tool, no single jurisdiction can gain an advantage. As one economist has noted, "to the extent that local authorities everywhere use IDB financing to compete against each other, any regional benefits to private businesses are eliminated and such financing functions simply as a conduit to the tax-exempt market."

Finally, there is little in current law to promote discretion among local authorities as to the use of the tax-exempt proceeds from IDB's. Aside from the few limitations already mentioned, local governments can utilize the Federal tax subsidy without regard to the priority of projects financed. No voter approval is necessary, no limits to number of issues is imposed. The results of such a policy is that IDB authority is abused often, and we see the Federal Treasury sponsoring multi-State retail operations, private planes and gambling establishments.

As a matter of good public policy, we have to insure that Federal tax dollars are going to good uses and, further, we have to be certain that those dollars—that tax subsidy—is being spent to build buildings, produce goods and create jobs that would not have come about without a subsidy.

In my view, the Congress must act to restrict the growth of IBD's. Tax exempt financing at levels that continue to grow without restraint is a luxury our Nation simply cannot afford.●

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

HON. CLARENCE D. LONG

OF MARYLAND

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. LONG of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an outstanding essay by James Rada, a constituent of mine from the Reisterstown area. James was the winner for the entire State of Maryland of the annual voice of democracy contest, held by the Veterans of Foreign Wars and its ladies auxiliary. This year more than 300,000 secondary school students participated in the contest competing for the five national scholarships which are awarded as top prizes. The contest theme this year was "My Role in Upholding Our Constitution".

I congratulate James on winning this impressive award and wish him

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

When I first began to consider my role in upholding the constitution, I came to a startling conclusion. The constitution had served me far better than I had served it. The constitution can serve us only if we obey it. The more precisely we obey it, the better it can serve us. However, if we choose to ignore its collected wisdom, the Constitution of the United States becomes only a piece of paper with words on it, and we become slaves under a totalitarian rule.

The government set forth within the articles of the constitution has a single purpose. That is, to help establish a democratic society in which the individual can grow and flourish. We can achieve the promise of this great document if we are willing to do our share. As a wise man once said: "All that is necessary for evil to prevail is that good men do nothing." We cannot sit back and expect others to assume our responsibilities.

Every citizen in the United States has a role in upholding our constitution.

My role is not always as simple as it may seem. I recall my reaction when Wayne Williams was first arrested for the string of Atlanta murders. I was furious. I felt that he deserved to be put to death on the spot. It was there that I realized I was ignoring one of the basic rights of the constitution—the right to a trial by jury.

The laws put forth in the articles and amendments of the constitution function best with the input of its citizens. Therefore, I have a responsibility to voice my opinions to my elected officials. Only through public opinion can the constitution adapt to suit our needs. Other duties along this line include, voting for the officials of my choice; supporting them during their terms of office; and voicing my dissent if I feel they are not carrying out the duties of their office properly.

The constitution also states that all Americans are equal. As an American, I must be willing to grant this equality to others regardless of their race, creed, or gender. Also, if the United States were to be attacked or go to war, I would be expected to come to the defense of a country that has defended me. In positions of authority, I must be careful not to abuse the power of the position. I should administer my power justly as prescribed within the constitution. When serving on a jury, I will allow the accused the right to present their case before I allow a judgment to be passed. I will not avoid taxes I legally owe, for these taxes are what allow the constitution to serve and function.

In general, my role in upholding the constitution is to follow all its laws to the best of my abilities. But, more importantly, it is every American's role to be vigilant and ever watchful that no one in our society is denied the protection of the constitution.

By doing this, I can maintain my own right to choose. It is a right to be cherished, for many people not of the United States don't share this same right.

The Constitution of the United States is our protector, our government, our lives. Allow it to thrive, and we will thrive. Destroy it, and we destroy ourselves.●

TRADE DEFICIT

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, in 1983, the United States had a merchandise trade deficit of $69 billion with the rest of the world. We in the Congress know that a trade imbalance of that size spells trouble with a capital T. We also know that the imbalance is growing and may reach $110 billion in 1984.

The reasons behind our huge trade imbalance and what the imbalance means in real terms is the topic of my most recent weekly newspaper column. It follows:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Don J. Pease, U.S. Congressman, 13th District)

In 1983, the U.S. had a merchandise trade deficit of $69 billion with the rest of the world.

That means that other nations around the world sold the U.S. $69 billion more in products than the U.S. sold to them.

A trade imbalance of that size spells Trouble with a capital T.

And the worst is yet to come. The merchandise trade deficit may hit $110 billion in 1984.

Faced with such gloomy statistics, some Americans wonder if something isn't dreadfully wrong with our manufacturing productivity. Others cast a suspicious eye at subsidized or dumped imports from overseas.

As it turns out, the three main causes of the huge trade imbalance relate neither to American productivity—that's good news—nor to unfair foreign imports.

The most clearly identifiable cause is the high value of the American dollar compared with other currencies. Since 1978, the American dollar has increased in value by 14 percent against the Japanese yen, by 27 percent against the German mark and by 69 percent against the French franc.

There are a variety of reasons, not the least of which are high U.S. interest rates which make the American dollar very attractive to foreigners. Another factor—if a foreigner is worried about revolutions or nationalization or wars—is that the U.S. is about the safest place in the world to invest money.

The result of the strong dollar is, for example, that a French firm wanting to buy an American-made product must pay almost twice as many French francs as in 1978. Conversely, a U.S. firm wanting to buy a French-made machine needs just slightly more than half as many dollars.

It's no wonder that U.S. exports lag while Americans buy foreign products in record amounts.

A second clause of the trade imbalance is the down side of some good news—the fact that the U.S. is coming out of the severe world-wide recession faster than most other nations. That means that American firms and individuals have money to buy foreign (as well as U.S.) products, but that foreigners are still having to curtail their purchases.

There is a third primary cause cited by experts such as Malcolm Baldrige, Secretary of Commerce, U.S. Special Trade Representative Bill Brock, and Martin Feldstein, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, who testified before the Trade Subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee last week.

That third cause is the debt crisis in Third World nations like Argentina, Brazil and Mexico. Strapped with enormous debt, they have drastically curtailed their purchases from abroad, and, in the past, the U.S. was a major supplier.

Commerce Secretary Baldrige does express some concern that U.S. companies allowed themselves to slip in productivity, but he thinks they now are regaining their competitive ability. And he says he is determined to stop unfair—subsidized or dumped—imports from coming into the U.S.

But all the experts who testified last week agreed on the three primary causes.

All also agreed that; given time, the U.S. trade deficit will correct itself.

Can we speed the process along? There's not much we can do about the slower pace of economic recovery of other nations nor about the debt crisis of Third World countries. But in the case of the American dollar which is a bit too strong for its own good, something can be done.

The "something" is reduction of federal deficits so that U.S. interest rates will fall and the dollar won't be quite as large a magnet for investors around the world.●

DENOUNCING THE ATTACK ON ISRAELI CITIZENS

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, acts of violence against Israel should not be tolerated. No one should recognize these groups that continue to seek attention by attacking innocent civilians and disrupting life in that democratic country.

The most recent terrorist attack in which 48 Israelis were injured on a busy Jerusalem street only serves to weaken the peace process for both Arabs and Israelis. While the reports naming the exact groups responsible for this outbreak are unclear, what is clear is that groups that have initiated this senseless violence in the past have not denounced this heinous act. Nor have they disassociated themselves from the violent attacks which have occurred in the past several months. It is in the interest of everyone of these groups, and all of Israel's neighbors to insure that this type of activity ceases. Let it be very clear to all, that the United States will not be blackmailed into funding arms programs to countries that are in anyway connected to these acts of terrorism.

Mr. Speaker, there is an urgent need for all sides to conduct an intensive search for peace and a lasting settlement in the Middle East. The first step in paving the way for peace is to put an end to these acts of terrorism. This must occur today.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE REVEREND EDWARD M. ZANNONI, S.X. OF THE XAVERIAN MISSIONARY OF FATHERS OF WAYNE, N.J., UPON THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF HIS ORDINATION AS A MISSIONARY PRIEST

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 7, the people of my congressional district and State of New Jersey will join with the Xaverian Missionary of Fathers of Wayne, N.J., at St. Joseph's Community Center, Paterson, N.J. in commemoration and celebration of the 25th anniversary of the ordination of Rev. Edward M. Zannoni, S.X., as a missionary priest. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our heartiest congratulations to Father Zannoni in recognition of his quarter of a century of total dedication and devotion to the service of God and the cause of brotherhood, good will, and understanding among all mankind.

Mr. Speaker, the faith and devotion of our people in a full communion of understanding, ever caring and respecting the individual religious beliefs of his fellow man has been the lifeline of our democracy—ever inspiring our people with hope and urging the individual on to great achievements and purposes in pursuing the fulfillment of his dreams and ambitions. The exemplary leadership and outstanding efforts of people so important to our quality of life are in the vanguard of the American dream. Today, we express our appreciation to Rev. Edward M. Zannoni whose esteemed commitment and unselfish devotion in promulgating spiritual guidance, goodwill, fellowship, and brotherhood in service to God have provided a lasting contribution to the quality of life of the people of our community, State, and Nation.

Father Zannoni was ordained to the Holy Order of The Priesthood on February 2, 1959 and has served as spiritual adviser and reverend father dedicated to the well being and happiness of each and every member of the many missions that he has served nationally and internationally. The quality of his leadership, the richness of his wisdom and the abundance of his caring and dedication to our young people and adults alike will be warmly expressed at the testimonial dinner in his honor on April 7. With your permission, I would like to insert at this point in our historic journal of Congress a brief profile statement on Father Zannoni that was forwarded to me by the Honorable Frances Squitieri, president of the Xaverian Mission League of Wayne, N.J., as follows:

Born at the foot of a mountain called Rock in the Appennines Chain between Pisa and Milan, Italy, Father Ed grew up on a farm. His parents, two brothers and four sisters knew hardship and hard work during the years of the second world war. The fall of Mussolini and the German invasion of Italy were experienced by the Zannoni family as a nightmare. Their house was ransacked and a guest was killed in it by a soldier.

When the war ended, young Edward and a friend—having read a magazine article about the missions—decided to inquire further about a possible new life. They, together, decided to leave home and enter the seminary of the Xaverian Missionary Fathers on August 22, 1946. As the day approached, the determination to go on weakened in Ed's friend, so Ed joined the seminary alone—going to school first in Ancona, then in Pilrenza, Venice, Milan. In 1954 the Superiors asked Edward to go to America to terminate his studies and help to establish the Xaverian Society. He arrived in New York aboard the ship Saturnia on October 28. He studied English for one year at Petersham, Massachusetts, taught by Mother Battego, founder of the Xaverian Sisters.

The four years of theology were spent partly in Massachusetts and partly in Wisconsin. On February 2, 1959 Edward Zannoni was ordained a priest in St. Sebastian Church, Milwaukee, Wisconsin with four other Xaverians. Following the ordination, Father Zannoni was assigned to the Novitiate house of Petersham as Vocation Director, a position he held for five years. From 1964 to 1970 Father Zannoni was Rector of the high school seminary in Holliston, Massachusetts.

In 1970–71 Father Zannoni was assigned to the Xaverian missions of Africa. In 1972 he was elected Provincial of the Xaverian Missionary Fathers in the U.S.A., an office held for six years. Since 1978 Father Zannoni has been in Wayne, New Jersey as Provincial Treasurer and Coordinator for Mission Assistance. He works tirelessly to raise the consciousness of all so that everyone may become more deeply involved in the cause of the missions and live the missionary spirit. Father Ed teaches by example. His direct participation in the Xaverian Leagues' activities, his ministry, assistance to the missions, service to the U.S. Province, directing youth at Camp Xavier, to name but a few of his many good works are expressions of his love for people and for Christ, who said: "You are my friends if you do what I command you."

During his 25 years as a priest, Father Ed has endeared himself to many people, reaching out to all, near and far. Enterprising, outgoing and hard working, he lives his priesthood, like Jesus, for others—not counting the score, but happy to be just part of the team. We all wish him well!

Mr. Speaker, our Nation was founded on the cornerstone of our people's faith in God which is truly the spirit, conscience and very being of our society. The dedication, devotion and untiring efforts of our revered clergy in pursuit of the noble cause of service to God and brotherhood, good will, and understanding among all mankind is applauded by all of us. We do indeed salute the Reverend Edward M. Zannoni, S.X. of the Xaverian Missionary Fathers of Wayne, N.J., upon the 25th silver anniversary of his ordination as a missionary priest.●

TRIBUTE TO LAZARO LOPEZ, MAY 19, 1885–OCTOBER 20, 1954

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, on May 13, 1871, Lazaro Lopez Gonzales and Manuela Hinojosa Gonzales, arrived in the Greater Falfurrias, Tex., area from Camargo-Tamaulipas, Mexico and purchased 12,000 acres of land. The Lopez family, rich in tradition and spirit, raised cattle and lived on this land for over 60 years. Andres Lopez Gonzales, one of Lazaro's and Manuela's 16 children, inherited over 3,000 acres of this land following the subdivision of his parents' estate. These 3,000 acres, located 11 miles southwest of Falfurrias, were known as the Soledad Ranch.

Andres Lopez was known for his success in raising cattle of the highest quality. He would take his steers to San Antonio, Tex., and received top dollar for his stock. In mid-1876, while selling his cattle in San Antonio, Andres Lopez met his future wife Guadalupe Gomez Coy. They later were married on August 17, 1876.

On May 19, 1885, in Rio Grande City, Tex., Lazaro Lopez was born to Andres and Guadalupe. His childhood was spent on the Soledad Ranch with his five brothers and four sisters. As a young man Lazaro Lopez attended Alamo Business College in San Antonio and following his return to Falfurrias, married his wife, the former Gertrudis Guerra on September 16, 1913. Lazaro and Gertrudis had three children, Maria Gertrudis, Andres Lopez, and Maria Guadalupe.

In the early 1920's, Lazaro Lopez and three of his five brothers, Andres Cruz, Jose Angel, and Trinidad, opened a general store in Falfurrias, selling groceries, clothing, and household goods. Enjoying success in the retail business, the Lopez brothers later invested in a service station, appropriately named, Lopez Brothers Service Station and a dairy goods business called Lopez Dairy. While his three brothers managed the daily operations of each business, Lazaro Lopez took care of the bookkeeping and legal work. Following his father's death, Lazaro also managed the family's ranching properties.

Lazaro Lopez was widowed in 1918 at the age of 32. With the assistance of his mother and other family members he raised his children. Because of his patience and understanding disposition, Lazaro Lopez was often looked to by his nieces and nephews for advice and counseling. Considered by many as a pioneer resident of Falfurrias, Lazaro Lopez also was noted for his accomplishments as an astute businessman and exemplary civic leader. Lazaro Lopez served as the postmaster of Falfurrias, the first county treasurer of Brooks County, Tex., and as a member of the Falfurrias School Board.

Mr. Speaker, when Lazaro Lopez died on October 20, 1954, he left to his family a legacy of love, and dedication to achieve excellence. I ask my colleagues to join me in paying tribute to Lazaro Lopez, a man who dedicated his life to the betterment of his neighbor and community.●

PORTUGUESE INTRODUCE UKULELE TO HAWAII

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, as a Portuguese-American, I would like to take this opportunity to share with you a recently published feature by Mr. Manuel Dias of Modesto, Calif. Mr. Dias, a proud American of Portuguese heritage, gives an accomplished account of the ukulele, a musical instrument that was introduced to the Hawaiians by Portuguese immigrants in 1879 and which had a significant effect on the type of Hawaiian music which resulted. This year 1984 marks the 105th anniversary of the introduction of the ukulele to Hawaii.

I hope you will find this article as interesting as I have.

The article follows:

THE UKULELE—A PORTUGUESE GIFT TO HAWAII

(By Manuel Dias)

OAHU, HAWAII.—John Henry Felix, Consul of Portugal, Leslie Nunes and Peter F. Denecal, Ph.D., authors of the book, "The Ukulele, a Portuguese gift to Hawaii, give credit in their novel to the Portuguese, who migrated from Madeira and Azores Islands, for introducing the musical instrument "Braguinha" to native Hawaiians.

This became the embryo development of the Ukulele and thus created the Hawaiian music as it is today.

It was the Hawaiian, King, David Kalakaua, whose appreciation for the Ukulele, helped to make the Ukulele Hawaii's most popular and distinctive musical instrument.

The year 1984 marks the 105th anniversary of the introduction of the Ukulele to Hawaii. The Ukulele, at first, in the form of the Portuguese "Braguinha", appeared with the arrival of the "Bark Ravenscrag" in Honolulu on August 23, 1879 from the island of Madeira.

The early Portuguese craftsmen who developed the Ukulele and its colorful history of acceptance by the native Hawaiians are credited for birthing of a new music for Hawaii's culture. They, too, will be remembered for giving to Hawaii, the ukulele—the Portuguese greatest gift. By 1900, the Ukulele had become the standard accompaniment for the hula.

Portuguese settlers brought the small, four-stringed instrument which we call the Ukulele to Hawaii just over one hundred years ago.

The Ukulele is a member of the guitar family of musical instruments, and underwent many years of evolutionary development as a product of Portuguese culture.

The modern Ukulele is a close relative of the "Cavaquinho" of mainland Portugal, and the "Braguinha" of the Portuguese islands of Madeira. Madeira was the homeland of the first group of Portuguese settlers in Hawaii.

The Madeirian Portuguese enjoyed their native songs and dances. There were many festive occasions during the year, and "Braguinha", "Mandolin" and "Guitar" music were an essential part of these celebrations.

The vineyards were the mainstay of the Madeirian economy during the Nineteenth Century, and the playing of the "Braguinha" was closely associated with the celebrations which followed the harvest of the grapes.

The first large contingent of Portuguese immigrants arrived in Hawaii immigrants arrived in Hawaii aboard the sailing ship "Priscilla", in September, 1878. It is not known whether any of the one hundred and twenty passengers abroad the "Priscilla" brought a braguinha to Hawaii.

Within a year the arrival of the "Priscilla", a second major contingent of Portuguese settlers arrived in Hawaii aboard the bark "Ravenscrag".

Historians are certain that at least one "braguinha" was present aboard the "Ravenscrag" when she sailed in Honolulu harbor on August 23, 1879.

The 419 Portuguese settlers aboard the "Ravenscrag" had been at sea for four months. Their voyage had taken them from the Madeirian islands in the Atlantic Ocean, through the Straits of Magellan in the southernmost part of South America, and northward to the Hawaiian Islands in the mid-Pacific Ocean, a journey of 15,000 miles. The voyage of the "Ravenscrag" was one of twenty-nine voyages which brought a total of more than 20,000 Portuguese settlers to Hawaii between 1878 and 1913. This migration of the Portuguese to Hawaii is one of the epic migrations of modern times.

Aboard the "Ravenscrag" were five men who are closely identified with the Ukulele in Hawaii; Augusto Dias, Jose do Espirito Santo and Manuel Nunes were craftsmen able to build fine musical instruments by hand. João Luiz Correa and João Fernandes were musicians who knew how to play a number of stringed instruments including the "Braguinha".

There is a strong possiblity that João Fernedanes was the first person to play the "Braguinha" in Hawaii. As the story goes, when the "Ravenscrag" docked in Honolulu harbor there was a spontaneous desire among the passengers to give thanks and celebrate their safe arrival in the new land. Fernandes borrowed a "Braguinha" from Gomes da Silva, a fellow passenger, and began playing Portuguese music. Others joined Fernandes with song and dance to the delight of Hawaiian bystanders, and the "Braguinha" (soon to be known as the "ukulele" had made its debut in Hawaii.

PRODUCTION AND SALE

Oral tradition within the Nunes families maintains that Manuel Nunes opened a shop for the manufacture and sale of Ukuleles almost immediately following the arrival of the "Ravenscrag". The first written evidence of the presence of ukulele shops in Honolulu is the 1884 City Directory, which shows that Nunes and Dias had each opened their own shops by 1884. A later edition of the City Directory confirms that Jose do Espirito Sa[illegible] had joined Nunes and Dias in the independent manufacture and sale of ukuleles by 1888.

CONCLUSION

Hawaii's ukulele has undergone some modifications with the passage of time. For example, Nunes, Dias and Santo used the native Hawaiian kou and koa woods in the manufacture of their instruments. The use of these Hawaiian materials, the tastes of the men who manufactured ukuleles, and preferences of the people who bought and played them during those early years, undoubtedly caused subtle changes in the design, and even the musical qualities of the instrument. Thus the ukulele, which began in Hawaii as a product of Portugese folk culture, became the distinctly Hawaiian instrument that we are familiar with today.

RAJAO

The "braguinha" was not the only instrument the Portugese brought to Hawaii, they brought the Rajao as well. The Rajao, somewhat larger than the ukulele, is a five-stringed instrument with a lower tone than the ukulete. It become known as the "taro patch fiddle" because the field workers enjoyed carrying the instrument to the fields and playing it during work breaks.

There are several versions of how the ukulele received its name. One most popular appeared in the 1926 Hawaiian Annual.

ORIGINS OF UKULELE'S NAME

A certain army officer (Edward Purvis) who early in the 80's came to make the islands his home, took a keen interest in Hawaiian's and Portugese alike and having noted the little Rajao (actually, the braguinha) and being an apt musician, he adopted it with the same pleasure as the natives. He soon became a master of it and was seldom seen without it, and when he later became attached to the court of King Kalakaua, often amused the gatherings with his expert playing. The Hawaiians loved him and gave him the affectionate nick-name of "ukulele", the "jumping flea", but figuratively applicable to his nimble movements and small stature, which contrasted markedly with their huge frames and deliberate movements. The instrument became known as Uku-lele's instrument and later the name was transferred to it.

According to another version, the rapid motion of the musician's fingers across the ukulele's strings reminded Hawaiians of a jumping flea. This simple explanation of the naming of the ukulele is quite possibly the most accurate one.

ROYAL INSTRUMENT

The ukulele became popular with the people of Hawaii almost immediately after its arrival in the islands. Within a short time, the ukulele appeared at Iolani Palace, the royal residence of King David Kalakaua, Hawaii's "Merry Monarch". In those days, Iolani Palace was a center of Hawaiian dance, music and culture; the King was an accomplished guitarist who wrote music and enjoyed experimenting with the hula. Kalakaua was delighted with the ukulele, and while playing it he changed the tempo of the sedate Hawaiian "hula" to the spirited rhythm characteristic of the hula in contemporary times.

THE PORTUGUESE MUSICIANS

Augusto Dias, José do Espirito Santo and João Fernandes helped to popularize the ukulele by performing for the royal court and for people of all walks of life throughout Oahu.

Santo, Nunes and Dias produced beautiful handcrafted instruments which remain unsurpassed for their clarity of tone. Young men and boys gathered around the three master craftsmen in their shops to watch them work and to play their instruments. The three craftsmen sold their ukuleles to the Kings and queens of Hawaii to young men who wanted to serenade their girl friends, to hula girls, to fun-loving people who entertain at luaus, and to visitors from the mainland who wished to take home with them Hawaii's distinctive musical instrument, the ukulele.

UKULELE IN CALIFORNIA

Then in the early 1900s, Flora and Ethel Cannon, granddaughters of Manuel Nunes, taught and popularized the ukulele in California. Portuguese-Hawaiian string bands provided lively entertainment at social gatherings during the early decades of the 20th century.

BANDS, FAMOUS MUSICIANS

Following the acceptance of the ukulele as a Hawaii national instrument, popular string bands were formed. One well known group was the Royal Hawaiian Troubadours. And then came the birth of outstanding composers, performers and teachers like Auntie K. Namakelua, Arthur Godfrey, who have been recognized leaders of ukulele music.

Ohta, who appeared on the Ed Sullivan Show in 1955, and since has produced over twenty albums, is acknowledged as a ukulele virtuoso throughout the world.

Jesse Kalima, Hawaii's first great ukulele virtuoso, at age 15 won the Territorial Amateur Hour contest with a superb rendition of "The Stars and Stripes Forever" on his ukulele. During subsequent years, Kalima pioneered in the development of the ukulele as a solo instrument.

BACK IN PORTUGAL

October 1979, 101 years later, the ukulele was returned to Portugal. It was on this day that I photographed the President of Portugal, António dos Santos Ramalho Eanes, as he received the new virgin of the "Braguinha", the ukulele, from the Hawaiian official delegation, led by John Henry Felix, Consul of Portugal-Hawaii.

During the year 1979 the Hawaiians honored the Portuguese for their contributions to the ukulele, with a centennial celebration commemorating the arrival of the ukulele in Hawaii from the island of Madeira, Portugal.●

EAGLE FLIGHT AVIATION EXPLORERS DINNER

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to call the attention of my colleagues to a very special program in my district that allows young people to learn a very special skill, one that we all dream about—flying.

Rev. Russell R. White is the man responsible for bringing about this program. He is pastor of the Bethel Baptist Church in Orange, N.J., and also has the distinction of being commander of the Eagle Flight Aviation Post No. 290. For 9 years he has been an inspiration and a teacher for many of our young people, conducting an outstanding flight training school. On Saturday, April 7, the Eagle Flight Aviation Explorer's Dinner will be held at East Orange High School, honoring the students who will be graduating. The dinner will also include an awards program.

It was a great privilege for me to nominate three of the school's graduates to the U.S. Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs—Doug Williams, James Allen, and David Dansby, all of East Orange, N.J.

I salute the following individuals who will be given merit awards on Saturday night for their contributions to the school, including: Albert Parisi, a staff writer for the New York Times; State Assemblywoman Mildred Garvin; State Senator Richard Codey; Essex County Executive Peter Shapiro; and Raymond Williams, president of the greater New York chapter of the Tuskegee Airmen.

The following people will receive service awards for their contributions to the school: Jerome Lee, chief of operations of Tri-State Airline and also a flight instructor at the school; Irving Carter, a captain for Tri-State Airline and a former Eagle Flight Explorer; James Harrison, a captain for Great Lakes Airlines and an Eagle Flight instructor; Adonis Dickerson, Eagle Flight Ground School instructor and engineer for Singer Keerfott; and Mrs. Ida Woody of Woody's Funeral Home in Orange, N.J.

The mistress of ceremonies for Saturday's event will be Connie Woodruff, and the guest speaker will be Mrs. Arlene Feldman, director of aeronautics for the New Jersey Department of Transportation.

There are many people involved with the Eagle Flight Aviation Post who deserve recognition, including: Mrs. Marilyn Lewis, president of the Parents Committee; Mrs. Justin Congleton, associate adviser; Robert Blackman, also associate adviser; Paul Bey, police officer in East Orange and an associate adviser; Mrs. E. Barbour of the Parents Committee; and James Young, meteorologist and ground school instructor.

But most important, I salute Reverend White. Were it not for his efforts, the Eagle Flight Aviation Post No. 290 would not exist. His impact on countless young people has been tremendous. Reverend White has received widespread recognition for his outstanding leadership in this area. He enjoys the esteem and respect of the entire community, and I am proud to count myself among his admirers. We all owe him a great deal, particularly the young people whom he has inspired with dreams of conquering the sky—and helped to develop the skills needed to achieve that goal.●

VOICE OF DEMOCRACY CONTEST

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Miss Jean Mackin, an outstanding citizen from Potomac, Md.

Miss Mackin has the honor of writing the winning speech in the Voice of Democracy contest sponsored by the U.S. Veterans of Foreign Wars and its Ladies Auxiliary. Over 300,000 secondary students participated in the contest and I am proud that a constituent of mine is the prestigious winner.

With students like Miss Mackin we should be proud of the generation of students who will some day become the new leaders of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues this prize winning speech and hope they enjoy it as much as I did.

The speech follows:

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

America . . . just the sound of the word makes you feel good. Maybe because America means freedom, and opportunity, and dreams, but possibly the greatest thing about America is her people. So many different people. People from all over the world come to live in America. Some risk their lives to reach the freedom we have here. And once men are here they are willing to die to keep our country free . . . and it's not surprising.

Freedom is so priceless a gift. To have the freedom to speak your will, to reach for your dreams, and to be who you want to be is so distant to many countries around the world, yet in America it is a way of life.

Each and every person has the chance at doing what he or she really wants to do. With the right determination one person can affect all humanity. Just one man or one woman can change the world for the rest of us. Whether that change is a beneficial one or not.

A single person, a single mind, a single belief can make history. Take Mother Theresa or take Adolf Hitler. It does not matter whether you are a man or a woman, whether you are black, or white, or oriental, one person adds so much to the world. And, in turn, the loss of one person can take away so much from the world.

This past year a young girl at my school was killed in an automobile accident. Now she is just another statistic, one of the thousands of people that die every year. Her death is truly a loss to her family and friends, but if a gain can be found in a loss then life is given so much more meaning.

Maybe her death gives us a stronger reason to really live. Not just to wake up in the morning because you have to, but to wake up in the morning because you want to. And when you are able to rise you should think how lucky you are. And when you see your reflection in the mirror you should be proud of who you are because you are one of a kind and you make a difference.

So few people realize how gifted they are just to have the chance at enjoying one more day. Life is not just Xing off the days on the calendar, it is taking each day and squeezing as much out of it as you possibly can.

Life is using your freedom and gifts to help others. It's respecting your neighbors' rights and your neighbors' dreams. It's setting a goal and having the chance to reach for it. And this is what the United States Constitution is all about.

To uphold the Constitution is to do your very best in living day to day. It's standing up for your beliefs and standing back to hear the beliefs of others. It's voting for the person who represents the best in you and running for an office that will bring out the best in you. It's being thankful for the freedom and justice offered to each and every one of us in our great land.

To uphold the Constitution is to stand up for the rights of life. And what could possibly be better to believe in than life itself?●

THE ECONOMIC RECOVERY TAX ACT OF 1981

HON. JAMES M. SHANNON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981, Congress passed several amendments to the Internal Revenue Code which were designed: First, to facilitate the provision of financial assistance to troubled FSLIC-insured institutions, and second, to promote the merger of financially troubled savings institutions into healthy institutions. With regard to financial assistance rendered to domestic building and loan associations by the FSLIC, code section 597 was enacted to exclude such assistance from the gross income of the recipient association, and to provide that such assistance would not serve to reduce the basis of the recipient's assets.

Similarly, ETA amended section 593 on the recapture of bad debt reserves. The new provision exempts from the recapture rules distributions paid to the FSLIC by a thrift institution with respect to instruments originally issued by the recipient to the FSLIC in exchange for the financial assistance. Without this change, such redemption distributions would have triggered recapture to the thrift institution, as ordinary income, of bad debt reserves similar to that which occurs when a savings and loan association makes a dividend payment on its stock or undertakes to redeem part of its stock.

The bill which I introduced on Friday will enhance the effectiveness of financial assistance rendered by deposit insurance agencies, and thus thwart the demise of financially troubled thrift institutions. This bill amends sections 593(e) and 597 of the code to insure that troubled thrift institutions receiving assistance from State deposit insurance agencies will enjoy the same tax status as domestic building and loan associations receiving FSLIC assistance. Additionally, the bill amends section 265 of the code to allow recipient thrift institutions to deduct from gross income those expenses allocable to any amount received under the financial assistance provisions to which I have referred. This approach maximizes the impact of the assistance.

With regard to section 597, the bill expands the description of thrift institutions to include all categories of institutions insured—those insured by the FSLIC as well as by State deposit insurance agencies. It also expands the definition of assistance to include not only that which is rendered by the FSLIC under section 406(f) of the National Housing Act, but also assistance by State deposit insurance agencies rendered pursuant to similar provisions in the State.

With regard to section 593, the bill amends that section at (e)(1) to track the changes in section 597. Finally, as noted, the bill amends code section 265 to permit recipient thrift institutions to deduct as business or interest expenses those expenses allocable to assistance made exempt by code section 597.

I believe that this bill will significantly improve the protection of savings depositors by conserving the funds of our State deposit insurance agencies. This bill merely expands the ERTA effort to assist financially troubled thrift institutions to cover those insured by these State deposit insurance agencies as well as those insured by the FSLIC. I attach a copy of the bill for insertion into the RECORD.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 597 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to FSLIC financial assistance) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 597. FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE.

"(a) EXCLUSION FROM GROSS INCOME.—Cross income does not include any amount of money or other property received—

"(1) from the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation pursuant to section 406(f) of the National Housing Act (12 U.S.C. 1729(f)), or

"(2) from any State deposit insurance agency pursuant to similar provisions of State law, regardless of whether any note or instrument is issued in exchange therefor.

"(b) NO REDUCTION IN BASIS OF ASSETS.—No reduction in the basis of assets of a bank shall be made on account of money or other property received under the circumstances referred to in subsection (a).

"(c) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) STATE DEPOSIT INSURANCE AGENCY.—The term 'State deposit insurance agency' means any organization which is organized under State law for the sole purpose of insuring or guaranteeing deposits or accounts or providing liquidity to banks.

"(2) BANK.—The term 'bank' has the meaning given to such term by section 581."

(b) The table of sections for part II of subchapter H of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by striking out the item relating to section 597 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 597. FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE."

(c) The amendments made by this section shall apply to amounts received after the date of the enactment of this Act in taxable years ending after such date.

SEC. 2. (a) The last sentence of section 593(e)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to distributions to shareholders) is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "or to any distribution to any State deposit insurance agency (as defined in section 597(c)(1)) in redemption of an interest in the association or institution if such interest was originally received by such agency in exchange for money or other property excluded from gross income under section 597(a)".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to distributions made after the date of the enactment of this Act in taxable years ending after such date.●

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF BOY SCOUT TROOP 782

HON. MARTY RUSSO

OF ILLINOIS

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, on April 7 of this year, Boy Scout Troop 782 of Blue Island, Ill., will be celebrating their 50th anniversary. I know we all share in our appreciation of this fine program and today I would like to pay tribute to Troop 782 for their commitment and achievements in the best of scouting tradition.

The Boy Scouts of America reflects the beliefs of our great Nation—in striving for goals, in working in cooperation with others and developing the best of one's individual potential. These young men are part of a unique group. From the moment they take their oath, they are taught the meaning of responsibility, care, commitment, and pride.

William Boyce, a Chicago newspaper publisher, introduced Scouting to America in 1910. He discovered this program on a trip to England when a scout there did a good deed for him. We all owe a great deal to that English Scout. Mr. Boyce could not foresee the profound impact of his program but he did see a need for Scouting in this country.

I think the Scouts from Blue Island, Ill., can take pride in their anniversary, for it is not an everyday occur rence that a program can display 50 years of success. A perfect illustration of this is the marigold madness project, an effort to beautify their community by having each resident plant a marigold in their yard. Scoutmaster Mark Johnson and the troop were able to get 89 percent of the town to participate.

Troop 782 and the Boy Scouts are a reflection of the American tradition: To be prepared for the challenges and opportunities that life has to offer. I congratulate them for their work in making Scouting a successful program, for their contributions to our country, and for a job well done.●

HON. RICHARD A. GEPHARDT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, on March 27 it was necessary for me to be absent from the House, and I missed rollcall No. 55, on final passage of H.R. 3755, to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide for reform in the disability determination process. Had I been present and voting, I would have voted "'yea."●

IN SUPPORT OF A BILL NAMING THE U.S. COURTHOUSE IN HATO REY, PUERTO RICO: CLEMENTE RUIZ NAZARIO

HON. BALTASAR CORRADA

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, it is with a deep sense of pride and satisfaction that today I introduce a bill naming the new U.S. District Courthouse in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico in honor of the late Judge Clemente Ruiz Nazario. The Honorable Clemente Ruiz Nazario was the first Puerto Rican to serve on the Federal bench in Puerto Rico and, for that matter, in the entire U.S. court system. His outstanding service at the bench left us a legacy of sound legal judgment and unbiased decisions based on justice and fairness. His accomplishments led the way to a new era in the U.S. District Court in Puerto Rico where now seven Puerto Ricans serve with distinction as Federal district court judges.

Judge Ruiz Nazario received his law degree from the University of Puerto Rico School of Law with honors in 1921 and became a very prominent lawyer on the island. During his over 30 years in the practice of law, Judge Ruiz Nazario built a reputation for being an able lawyer and a fine servant of the court. He served as judge in the U.S. District Court for the district of Puerto Rico for 14 years from March 28, 1952 until December 30, 1966 when he retired at the age of 70. President Truman appointed him to the bench in 1952 to an 8-year term during which his noteworthy performance secured his reappointment by President Eisenhower in 1960. Judge Ruiz Nazario served as the sole Federal judge on the island until 1961 when Congress approved a second position for a judge in Puerto Rico and he became the chief judge.

Judge Ruiz Nazario's service to our community went far beyond the court. He was a member of the board of trustees of the University of Puerto Rico; chairman of the Anti-Tuberculosis Campaign Fund; president of the Anti-Tuberculosis Association, San Juan Chapter and president of the Boy Scouts of America for the New York, New Jersey, and Puerto Rico region.

Throughout his professional career, Judge Ruiz Nazario earned the esteem, respect, and admiration of those who practiced with him, against him, and before him. He was a good natured, down to Earth judge endowed with great wisdom and sensitivity and fully devoted to the ends of justice. The significance in a historical perspective of Judge Ruiz Nazario's appointment to the Federal bench coupled with his untiring dedication to judicial excellence and contributions to the better administration of justice in Puerto Rico, make him an obvious choice for this recognition. The chief judge and judges of the U.S. District Court for the district of Puerto Rico as well as the legal community in Puerto Rico join me in supporting this bill to name the new U.S. District Courthouse in Hato Rey, Puerto Rico, in honor of this learned jurist, wise solon, and excellent human being, the Honorable Clemente Ruiz Nazario.●

IT IS STILL A PENTAGON BUDGET

HON. MARCY KAPTUR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, the House will soon begin debate on a deficit reduction package of which the size of the military budget will be a key component. The administration is touting its deficit reduction plan as a balanced plan of reductions in defense spending, reductions in domestic spending and revenue increases. In reality the plan contains further increases in defense spending when measured against both current defense spending levels and last year's bipartisan congressional budget resolution. Furthermore, proposals to stretch out spending on weapons systems rather than eliminating weapons programs or reducing the number of weapons to be purchased do not really attack the deficit problem in the long term. A recent Congressional Budget Office study reports that in some cases stretching out could increase the total cost of a weapons system because the unit cost of each weapon would rise.

I call my colleagues attention to a recent op-ed piece in the New York Times by Steven Wolfe and Robert Greenstein which describes the large increases in the Pentagon budget in the administration's deficit reduction plan. The article, "It's Still a Pentagon Budget" follows:

IT'S STILL A PENTAGON BUDGET

WASHINGTON.—The new Reagan budget plan, which is supposed to help reduce the Federal deficit, has been portrayed by the Administration as a balanced mix of defense and domestic spending reductions. The balance, however, is hard to find.

On the domestic side, the new budget plan would cut nearly twice as much as the original Reagan budget, unveiled in January, and would further shrink most social programs. At the same time, the new plan continues to provide hefty increases for the Pentagon, enlarging defense spending at twice the growth rate approved by Congress last year.

Moreover, because the new White House proposal avoids cutting major weapons, it leaves unchecked the heart of the defense budget problem: runaway weapons spending. Any serious effort to roll back the mounting Federal deficit must include restraint on new weapons as a central element.

Last year, Congress appropriated $264 billion for defense. Under the Administration's new plan, defense appropriations for fiscal 1985 would jump to $299 billion, a $35 billion increase. Even after accounting for inflation, this is an increase of $19 billion, or 7 percent. One year ago, when the deficit problem looked less traumatic than it does today, Congress approved an after-inflation defense increase of about 3.5 percent.

The new plan represents an increase for defense spending over the 1985 levels approved by Congress in last year's budget resolution. In fact, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has found that when measure against last year's budget resolution, defense spending levels in the new White House proposal would actually enlarge the deficit, not shrink it.

This leaves us where we started several months ago: the President resists having defense contribute to reducing the deficit. He also resists the only strategy that would bring defense spending under control: tackling the burgeoning list of expensive new weapons purchases.

Weapons spending has driven the defense budget since 1981 and the looms even larger in the future. The share of defense spending going to "investment" (research and production of new weapons plus military construction) has risen from 37 percent in 1980 to a projected 50 percent in 1985.

The costs of weapons systems are spread over several years, with the bulk of the spending coming after the first year. Thus, the costs we are now seeing for new weapons systems are just the tip of the iceberg.

In addition, the cost of new weapons tends to rise well beyond initial predictions. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that the Pentagon has understated the cost of its planned weapons systems and other procurements by $72 billion over the next five years. The General Accounting Office recently reported that the entire defense program may be underestimated by as much as $300 billion over the same period. In future years, we can expect sharp, upward revisions in Pentagon budget requests and arguments for spending additional billions to complete projects whose costs were initially understated.

Close scrutiny of new weapons is crucial because contracts are spread into Congressional districts all across the country, making cancellation unlikely. For example, there are contracts or subcontracts for the B-1 bomber in 48 states in all but a handful of Congressional districts.

Numerous new weapons purchases could be eliminated before they become deeply rooted, and with no cost to the nation's security. Some are strategic nuclear systems that add to nuclear instability because of their link to "first-strike thinking" (the MX missile and the planned "Star Wars" defensive network, for example) or the difficulties they create for verification (sea-launched cruise missiles). Others have performed poorly in tests and could be halted without military loss: the Aegis cruiser, the Bradley M-2 fighting vehicle, the Sergeant York air defense gun and the infrared Maverick missile.

The Bradley and the Maverick also join a list of programs that are duplicative or simply excessive. These include the B-1 bomber, the DDG-51 destroyer, two new nuclear aircraft carriers, revived World War II battleships, the F-18 fighter and the proposed C-17 cargo plane.

Cutting these systems could reduce the deficit by as much as an additional $64 billion over the next three years while eliminating much of the pressure for future increases. But action to halt these weapons must be taken now, before production gets too far down the road.

Only if such steps are taken will defense spending contribute to deficit reduction and be part of a truly balanced approach to the serious deficit problem we now face.●

TRIBUTE TO CHARLES O. PYRON

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I would like to take the opportunity to recognize Mr. Charles O. Pyron of Jackson, Mich., for his achievement in being named Michigan Small Business Person of the Year. I am particularly proud to announce that this is the second straight year that an individual from Jackson has been so honored.

Mr. Pyron, 57, is president of ADCO Products, Inc., makers of automobile, marine, and architectural sealants, and is chairman elect of the Greater Jackson Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Pyron started ADCO Products in 1971 with Mr. Donald B. Strack, the company executive vice president. Prior to beginning ADCO, both men had been executives at Protective Treatments, Inc. of Dayton, Ohio. Mr. Pyron worked for Monsanto Chemical Co. until 1953, the year he joined Protective Treatments. He served as president of that firm from 1967 to 1972.

In addition to running ADCO Products, which employs some 100 people, Mr. Pyron is a member of the Michigan State Chamber of Commerce and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.●

GAUDENZIA HOUSE

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, Gaudenzia House is a nonprofit drug and alcohol treatment agency which has helped thousands of Pennsylvanians. The Gaudenzia program, which began with one residential facility in Philadelphia in 1968, is now the largest and oldest such program in the Commonwealth. It has 14 different, diversified programs in 13 locations in 4 counties throughout the State.

Gaudenzia recently prepared a cost-benefit analysis which discusses the many costs associated with addiction, and the subsequent gains that flow not only to the recovering addict but to the entire community with a successful rehabilitation. I want to share this information with my colleagues in the House of Representatives.

THE THERAPEUTIC COMMUNITY: AN EXPLORATORY COST BENEFIT ANALYSIS

(By Karen Scott Griffin)

The assessment of treatment methods for drug addiction usually focus on qualitative measures. However, Gaudenzia has provided a quantitative and monetary analysis of the benefits that result from the operation of the agency's long-term residential treatment program (a therapeutic community).

The following information summarizes a review of the monetary factors associated with at-large drug addiction and a financial comparison of untreated addiction and inpatient treatment of the same population. The purpose of this research was to outline the differential in costs to the community/society in which addicts reside, in this case Pennsylvania, when the individual is in treatment as opposed to "on the streets."

In order to demonstrate the direct and indirect financial gain to the state, federal, and local governments and the public in general, the following discussion will examine several factors which are unquestionably affected by the services provided in Gaudenzia's program. This analysis is based on the recovery of drug addicts at a rate consistent with that of the Gaudenzia long-term program. The studies used to compile information for this analysis are mainly concerned with the drug-dependent person—one whose use of drugs results in frequent habitual use, seriously interferes with normal functioning, and brings about official identification as a "drug-dependent" individual by law enforcement or treatment agencies.

After a review of Gaudenzia's statistics it was assumed that a minimum yearly estimate of 10 drug-dependent persons are recovered and returned to the mainstream of society. This number is reduced from actual average number of graduates to account for the small amount of relapse and those not classified as severely drug dependent. (Graduation requires continuing contact with the agency and several other criteria. It should be noted that among those clients who successfully complete inpatient treatment, a certain number do not become graduates, but remain drug-free and stable in the community.) Based on this estimate, figures considered in this analysis are computed to project the cost benefit of Guadenzia's long-term treatment program over 5 years (1982-1986), the results of the recovery of 50 addicts.

Two major areas of impact are examined: costs relating to the change in personal income status and costs relating to the criminal lifestyle of the drug addict, both direct and indirect. The primary focus is a general comparison between the costs of continuing addiction and the accompanying lifestyle and the gain realized by successful rehabilitation.

One of the primary treatment goals for the Gaudenzia resident is the acquisition and maintenance of gainful employment. When an addict reverses the dependent lifestyle of addiction and maintains employment, he/she not only ceases to drain public funds, but simultaneously adds to them in the form of income taxes. The financial gain which will be realized by federal, state and local governments through Gaudenzia's graduating population estimate over a 5-year period has been calculated at $954,000.

Drug addiction is expensive to maintain, and the unfortunate fact is that the costs of supporting a steady habit have to be borne not by the addict but by virtually everyone else. The progression by which these costs are passed on to the general public is a familiar one; a "ripple effect", spreading the absorption of this staggering expense over a broad range of public and private entities. Among the secondary cost factors of addict crime is law enforcement intervention. Although these factors are complex and impractical to calculate, it is evident that they would include, at a minimum: police protection and intervention expenses; costs of prosecution, processing, record keeping, and public legal counsel; and investigation costs on a federal, state and local level.

Not enumerated in the above factors are the actual costs of imprisonment resulting from drug-related criminality, another of the indirect expenses of addiction. Computed from nationally established statistics the costs of the estimated period of addict imprisonment for Gaudenzia graduates over a 5-year period totals $267,750.

The most appreciable monetary impact of addiction is the direct cost of drug related theft and other crimes. Although these costs are shared by many, it is useful to point out the magnitude of expense incurred through addict crime. Factors contributing to this cost are computed on the average frequency of addict crime, established by previous research, and a $200 estimate (computed conservatively on the basis of addict interviews and published literature) of the loss and/or damage incurred during days of criminal activity. Based on this formula, the computation of crime costs for the 50 addicts Gaudenzia expects to rehabilitate over 5 years totals $5,340,000.

As indicated in the beginning text, one of the intentions of this report is to compare the cost of drug dependency with that of therapeutic community treatment and the monetary benefit of subsequent recovery. In order to make this comparison, it is necessary to outline the costs of the rehabilitation process based on a realistic treatment duration. The cost of the treatment for the predicted 10 graduates per year over the 5-year period is $727,150.

Bearing in mind that the figures used to arrive at this cost/benefit comparison represent conservative estimates, the resulting differential, outlined below, tends to speak for itself.

	Differential
To date cost reduction through rehabilitation:
Gain by income status.....	954,000
Reduction in penal costs.	+267,750
Reduction in crime costs.	+5,340,000
Total	6,561,750
To date treatment costs	−727,150
Differential.....	5,834,600

It should be noted that even if one eliminates the very high figure associated with criminality, the costs to the system are still reduced by $494,585 through Gaudenzia's program over the 5-year period.

And finally, another important factor which actually increases this cost benefit to a still higher figure is the time in treatment of those clients who do not complete the program. Assuming that 25 of these clients manifest the previously discussed addiction patterns while they are at large, cost savings can be postulated for the cessation of their addictive behavior while in treatment during the 5-year period considered in this discussion. This results in an additional cost benefit of $3,281,500. This cost benefit can quite logically be added to the $5,834,600 savings realized through Gaudenzia's successfully-recovered clients, bringing the cost benefit to the society and governmental system in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to a total of over 9 million dollars.

These figures demonstrate that the utilization of the therapeutic community modality by the criminal justice system as an alternative for appropriate offenders is imperative. The waste of human lives and taxpayers dollars, particularly in the current economic crisis, cannot be dismissed.●

COMMEMORATING BYELORUSSIA'S 66TH INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, the Soviet Union has failed to silence the voice of the Byelorussian people. Again and again, the Soviets try to suppress entire cultures. In the case of the Byelorussian people, the Soviets have been unable to penetrate the hearts and minds of a culture marked with a proud past and a growing future.

Last week Byelorussians celebrated the 66th anniversary of the declaration of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. It was an important occasion because it brought to our attention the determined sense of awareness the Byelorussian people have for their own culture.

In the last few years, the Byelorussian language has gained broader appeal. The Byelorussian language television channel has gained wider popularity. This is a sure signal of a people intent on maintaining cultural affiliations.

Another positive sign, is the increased popularity of modern Byelorussian literature. The publishing companies, magazines, and other arms of the media that cater to this culture prosper within the Iron Curtain despite official attempts to disband these entities.

I have appealed to Konsantin Chernenko in the last few weeks to change course and offer a new direction toward peace. I believe that the release of these occupied nations and the acknowledgment of these cultures would be a step in the right direction.

The Byelorussian culture will continue to grow, and we must make appeals to the Soviet leadership to let it grow. There are responsibilities that Americans have as a free people. Foremost, is the responsibility to insure that others enjoy this same basic right of all mankind; freedom.

It has been suggested that through the Voice of America the United States can help perpetuate the Byelorussian culture. If that is the case, I firmly support the use of radio broadcasts that would accomplish these goals.

In our efforts to assist with the Byelorussian fight for freedom, we must not overlook any avenue that would bring about independence more expediantly. I join with the Byelorussian community today in requesting the administraton to examine these steps that will assist the cause of freedom.●

H.R. 5222, ROBBERY OF CONTROLLED SUBSTANCES

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that yesterday the House, with my support, passed H.R. 5222, a bill to make the robbery of controlled substances from pharmacies a Federal crime. I have cosponsored this legislation and I participated in hearings on similar legislation. I am privileged to serve as a member of the Subcommittee on Health and in that subcommittee helped develop a similar bill.

I have been a cosponsor of this legislation since the need for it was brought to my attention my pharmacists in my district. Sadly, our drug laws have had a perverse effect on those who legally dispense drugs. The Controlled Substances Act deals with the illegal entry of dangerous drugs into the United States. But by restricting the flow of illegal substances into the country, it has had the effect of making "street drugs" more expensive and making robbery of drugstores more "inviting." Ironically, it is a Federal crime for a pharmacist to illegally handle a controlled substance or to fail to report a theft of a controlled substance. But it is not a Federal crime to rob the pharmacy of the controlled substance in the first place.

The bill we passed fills an important loophole in our criminal drug laws.

The increase in pharmacy robberies has social implications. First, the frequency of these crimes has restricted the availability of medically necessary controlled substances. According to a survey conducted by Myers, Brushwood & Grieshaber in March 1983, over 40 percent of pharmacies sampled, reduced or discontinued their inventory of controlled substances because of the danger to their security. How will patients requiring these drugs obtain them if community pharmacists will no longer carry them?

A second problem is increasing drug abuse. Thefts of controlled substances are the source of increasing drug abuse. General Accounting Office statistics show more abuse of controlled substances like morphone, diladid, other major pain killers and tranquilizers than the so-called street drugs like heroin and cocaine.

Our subcommittee also heard testimony indicating that people are discouraged from continuing in or entering the pharmacy profession because of fears of violence. The pharmacist is a vital link in the health care chain: It is the pharmacist who is sometimes more accessible to the family than other medical personnel; it is the pharmacist who people expect to provide help and relief at all hours. We must be doing as much as we can to enable pharmacists to serve the health care needs of our citizens. I hope this bill will see prompt enactment.●

TWIN CHAMPIONSHIPS

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, Saturday, March 24, 1984, was a big day, one not to be forgotten for everyone connected with Central Missouri State University. Players, coaches, students, alumni, and supporters are sure to savor the double triumphs of its men's and women's basketball teams winning both NCAA Division II championships.

The Mules captured the NCAA Division II title by defeating St. Augustine

College of Raleigh, N.C. with final score of 81 to 78, concluding their season with a school record 29-3. The Jennies decision 80 to 73 was played against Virginia Union, of Richmond, Va. racking up a season record of 27-5.

Clinching the twin championships will be one hard to match in years to come. Both teams have tremendous records this year and should be commended not only for their impressive victories but for their fantastic seasons.

The Jennies and Mules have made history as never before, having both the national men's and women's title been won by the same school in the same year.

Let me join in offering congratulations to all those who participated in capturing these coveted trophies, brought distinction to themselves, their school, and their State.●

U.N. VOTING RECORD UNDERSCORES ISRAEL LOYALTY

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to bring the most recent "Report to Congress on Voting Practices in the United Nations" to the attention of my colleagues.

While I am supportive of our participation in the United Nations and believe that the function for which it was originally created—world peace and dialog—is more valid than ever, this report, which measures a country's support for the United States based on that country's voting record, provides some important lessons.

While it is no surprise to followers of this world organization that the United States continues to be commonly outvoted in the United Nations, the votes of Middle East countries are especially informative when placed under close scrutiny. first, Israel voted with the United States in 93.3 percent of the votes, the highest percentage of any country in the United Nations. This figure speaks most eloquently to the fact that Israel is our most reliable ally in the United Nations and certainly in the Middle East.

Looking at some of the other Middle East countries which have been deemed moderates and friends of the United States is equally enlightening: Egypt voted with the United States 23.4 percent of the time, Jordan 17.2 percent, and Saudi Arabia 19.3 percent. These figures should give one pause when considering foreign aid packages, especially arms sales to so-called moderates. Let me point out that these figures are not mere aberrations. Last year I brought this document to the attention of my colleagues and at that time pointed out that Israel supported the United States 86.2 percent of the time, more than any other country, and that the Jordanians agreed 20.8 percent of the time, the Egyptians 26.2 percent, and the Saudis 24 percent.

While the report itself points out that "relations in the United Nations are only one dimension of our relations with other countries" it also points out that "the decisions of the United Nations are widely interpreted as reflecting world opinion," focusing world attention and even affecting U.S. foreign policy. If we reward our friends by ignoring their chosen capital and encourage those who consistently vote against us by bestowing upon them our most advanced weaponry, is it any surprise that our Middle East policy is a tangled mess?●

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE VOLUNTEER CENTER IN SYRACUSE, N.Y.

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, the adage that "a task is light when many share the toil" bespeaks a great deal about the American tradition of people working together to perform good works.

And, in America, good works are performed, in large part, by volunteers.

Volunteerism throughout our Nation has always been strong. Volunteer militiamen fought in our Revolution. In 1984, American volunteerism has never been stronger.

With signal pride, Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of our colleagues to the 50th anniversary celebration of the Volunteer Center of Syracuse, N.Y. It is the third oldest volunteer agency in the United States.

A half century ago, the Junior League of Syracuse proposed creation of a volunteer bureau. In 1934, the bureau was launched, on a 4-month trial basis. What began as an experimental, one-person office has blossomed into what today is a multisite, multiservice agency with a staff of more than 40 people. They recruit, train and place volunteers who assist their fellow citizens of our Syracuse area communities—the children, the troubled youth, the elderly, the ill, the handicapped, and the disadvantaged of all ages.

On Wednesday, April 11, the grateful citizens of the 27th Congressional District will commemorate the half century of service of the people who have volunteered their time and talents to this outstanding agency, at an anniversary dinner at the Hotel Syracuse. Our honored guest and speaker for this event will be Mrs. George Bush, wife of the Vice President.

In behalf of present and past volunteers and the staff of the volunteer center, it is with pride that I bring this occasion to the attention of the Congress.●

VOICE OF DEMOCRACY

HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, the Veterans of Foreign Wars conducts a Voice of Democracy contest each year for secondary school students across the country. This year, there were more than a quarter of a million participants from over 8,000 schools; more than 4,000 VFW posts and 3,500 auxiliaries sponsored the program to enhance understanding and appreciation of our system of government.

This year the New York State winner was from the area which I am pleased to represent in Congress. He is Clarence Anthony Ingram, of Henrietta, N.Y., a senior at Roth High School there. I would like to share our State's winning speech with my colleagues, and ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

The speech follows:

MY ROLE IN UPHOLDING OUR CONSTITUTION

My role in upholding our constitution is a role that was already designed for me before I was even born and that same goes for my parents and their parents.

The books tell me that it all began in Philadelphia in the summer of 1787 when 55 delegates wrote the Constitution of the United States. They had adopted their ideals from English law and practice, from colonial experiences, from the state constitutions, and from the Articles of Confederation; however, they did not borrow from sources they had not experienced. In a real sense, the constitution was a victory for man in the struggle for liberty and justice for all. It was not imposed by a foreign power or dictated to us, nor the product of military defeat. It was an act of free will, a triumph for democracy, a symbol of a good government in an age of European turmoil.

The constitution, a brief but well written document of about 7,000 words that does no more than organize our political institutions, describes our government system concisely, and allows for change and adaptations through usage and interpretation. And in 1791, a change did occur which I believe is the reason our constitution is a workable method and one of the oldest written constitutions in operation in the world, despite all the changes economically, socially, culturally, and politically, which has occurred since 1791. This change I am referring to was the ratification of the first ten amendments, the Bill of Rights—which limits the government by guaranteeing individual liberties.

These few amendments, which were derived from the Magna Carta, and the English Bill of Rights, are a part of the constitution that affect me the most. Thus, my role is to support the Bill of Rights, and to believe and defend them—and in doing this—I will be upholding our constitution and upholding the constitution is very important to me and to my country. But as important as my role is, it's also very easy. For you see, I am very proud to be an American and a citizen of the United States, and my role—well, my role is just to respect other citizens—and the law, and to vote and to urge friends and family to vote, and to understand the word "democracy," and how it affects me, and just by saluting the Flag—these are simple things—but they show loyalty and respect and pride for our country which is a role all citizens should incorporate in their lives, including myself.

But sometimes we lack in these qualities. I feel sometimes we lack in just common knowledge of the constitution. I mean—I see intelligent, bright, individuals who are ignorant of the Bill of Rights. They couldn't name them all if their lives depended on it. I mean—here we have basic rights guaranteed to us by law, natural rights such as freedom of religion, speech, press, and petition; protection against unreasonable searches and seizures, against self-incrimination. We are guaranteed the right to a speedy and public trial by a local and impartial jury before an impartial judge, and guaranteed representation by counsel, and rights of private property—as in the provision that private property should not be taken for public use without just compensation. Yes, here we have guaranteed rights that affect every citizen and some people do not even care or they just let their apathy take over. So my role in this situation is just to be an involved citizen who understands the constitution and who is willing to point out the Bill of Rights and its advantages to another citizen and, in doing this, I will have made my role even more important for that person who might acquire some knowledge from me and pass it on and they might pass it on, and on, and soon we will have started a chain reaction.

As I said before, my role in upholding our constitution is a very important role but it also is very easy for me because I believe in democracy, and I believe in the constitution, and in the Bill of Rights, and when you believe in something, it makes it that much easier to live by.

I remember Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., once said, "I have a dream." I think those 55 delegates had a dream when they wrote the constitution and, if you think about it, America is nothing but a dream * * * that just came true.●

FLEET SUBSIDIES BY AUTOMOBILE MANUFACTURERS MUST BE TERMINATED

HON. GENE TAYLOR

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, early in the 1st session of the 98th Congress I introduced H.R. 1415 in an effort to bring basic fairness to the pricing of motor vehicles and eliminate the preferred class of customers created by American automobile manufacturers as a result of fleet subsidies. This legislation was designed to allow purchasers to enter the automotive marketplace on an equal footing.

Domestic manufacturers are providing subsidies or discounts to a preferred group of corporate fleets in amounts often exceeding $1,000 per vehicle, while refusing these same subsidies or discounts to franchised new-car dealers who could pass these savings along to the general car-buying public.

I am convinced that the fleet subsidy practice clearly constitutes unfair price discrimination to individual consumers as well as to small business automobile dealers who sell approximately 80 percent of the automotive units in this country.

In the ensuing 13 months since I introduced H.R. 1415, 220 of my colleagues in the House have reached the same conclusion as I; fleet subsidies are unfair to the vast majority of automotive purchases. During these past months, while discussing this legislation with my colleagues, reviewing various departmental comments concerning it, and analyzing points raised during congressional hearings on it, it became apparent that certain portions of the language contained in H.R. 1415 needed clarification so that its central intent could not be misconstrued. To accomplish that purpose I have redrafted the bill.

Last Thursday, March 29, I introduced, along with my esteemed colleague, Representative WAYNE DOWDY, H.R. 5305 that clearly and simply prohibits new automotive sales by the manufacturer to certain classes of customers at a price cheaper than they sell to their franchised dealers for resale to the general public.

I urge my colleagues to review H.R. 5305.●

WYNONA LIPMAN NAMED "WOMAN OF THE YEAR"

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, this Friday, April 6, the Ironbound Manufacturers' Association will sponsor a luncheon at which my good friend Wynona Lipman will be given the association's prestigious "Woman of the Year" award. It is a very great honor for me to recognize her today.

Wynona Lipman has been in the New Jersey State Senate since 1970 and has served with distinction. A tremendously effective legislator, she is one of New Jersey's most articulate advocates for the rights of the poor and minorities. Senator Lipman has worked hard to improve the lives of her constituents, and has a dedication and passion for her work that has won her widespread admiration and respect. The people of the 29th district in New Jersey are most fortunate to have such an effective voice in the State senate. I consider myself fortunate to count Wynona Lipman as a good friend, and I am delighted that the Ironbound Manufacturers' Association has selected someone so worthy of the title "Woman of the Year."

The Ironbound Manufacturers' Association was founded in 1917 to promote improved working and living conditions in the ironbound community of Newark. For the past 6 years the association has singled out from the public and private sectors outstanding women in our community for this award. I offer my very best wishes to Wynona Lipman on this occasion.●

RUFUS BELL BURRUS: TRUMAN'S PERSONAL HISTORIAN

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, as we approach the centennial of the birth of Harry S. Truman, it is appropriate to take a close look at the history of the Truman era. There is no better insight to history than primary sources, and we are lucky that there are still a number of firsthand acquaintances of President Truman around to provide us with some of the colorful details of history. One such acquaintance of Harry Truman is Rufus Bell Burrus of Independence, Mo. Mr. Burrus was a personal friend of our great President and has a clear memory of the life and times of Mr. Truman. An interview with Mr. Burrus recently appeared in the Kansas City Star which gives us a good insight into the relationship between Mr. Truman and Mr. Burrus. I insert this article in the RECORD at this point and highly recommend it to my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the Kansas City Star, Feb. 5, 1984]

INDEPENDENCE LAWYER RECALLS A FAMOUS FRIEND

(By Rich Hood)

Rufus Bell Burrus, a cherub-faced 83-year-old with a halo of white hair, is on a crusade to preserve memories of his friend, Harry S. Truman.

"I want people to know about Mr. Truman firsthand," he said.

He's had good success.

The Smithsonian Institution's Division of American Politics recorded more than an hour of Mr. Burrus' recollections on videotape in front of the Jackson County Courthouse in Independence.

A transcript is to be released this year as part of the centennial celebration of Mr. Truman's birth.

Mr. Burrus, a retired Army lieutenant colonel who still practices law in an office just off the Independence Square, has tape-recorded memories for research projects of many others, including at least one university that has given a transcript to the Truman Library. His memories are featured prominently in Last of His Kind, an anecdotal history of Mr. Truman by Charles Robbins.

Last year, when he suffered a severe heart attack, it appeared that his crusade was endangered. But he has recovered. His step is slower, but his smile is warm and his memories sharp.

One of his favorite memories of the 33rd president concerns his own appointment as assistant county counselor, a position he held from 1927 until 1941.

"After he got elected presiding judge he called me and told me to meet him for lunch at the Teacup Inn, a very fancy place with white tablecloths on Grand between 10th and 11th.

"I knew something was up because when I was Downtown Mr. Truman and I usually ate at the Dutchman's, a place where they had rye bread, black tea, sardines and Limburger cheese.

"When I got to the Teacup Inn I found he had invited Fred Boxley for lunch, too. He looked at Fred and said: 'You're going to be my county counselor. You're my kind of Rabbit.'

"He looked me and said: 'You're going to be my assistant county counselor. You're my kind of Goat.' "

The two prominent factions among Jackson County Democrats at the time were the Rabbits of Joe Shannon and Tom Pendergast's Goats.

Mr. Burrus said he never asked for the job nor did he know before the lunch that it would be offered.

He recalled Mr. Truman going to talk with Mr. Pendergast about Mr. Truman's plans for a $6.5 million bond issue for road construction.

"Mr. Truman told Pendergast that he would have to select engineers of his own choosing. Pendergast told him that he (Mr. Truman) ran the road program and he would never interfere with the way he ran it. And Pendergast never went back on his word on that."

Mr. Burrus said he helped Mr. Truman draft and lobby successfully for a law that designated the presiding judge as budget officer so he could control the pursestrings of other county officials.

Mr. Burrus' speech is sprinkled with colorful country expressions.

He recalled helping Mr. Truman in one of his Senate campaigns on a day that was "hot as mischief."

During that primary campaign, he said, Mr. Truman was strapped for funds, he was "down to the nubbins."

"He wouldn't let us talk about him," Mr. Burrus said, "and we didn't while we were around him. We made our pitch for him when he wasn't there."

Mr. Truman, he said, never lost his independent spirit.

When he was in his 70s he bought a new car and insisted on driving Downtown. On the trip back to Independence Mr. Burrus was close behind in another car.

"There was a 25 mile speed zone, but he let it out," Mr. Burrus said.

"I cautioned him after we got back. I said, 'Chief, you were doing a pretty good clip.' "

Mr. Burrus said the former president pretended he did not know how fast he had been driving, but he urged Mr. Burrus not to tell Bess Truman, the ex-president's wife, about his heavy foot.

There were other times when Mr. Burrus said he attempted to protect Mr. Truman.

"I was his watchdog." he said with a sense of deep content.

Now he's also his personal historian.●

DO WE WANT TO PROVIDE HEALTH CARE FOR RURAL AMERICANS?

HON. RONALD D. COLEMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing H.R. 5273 and H.R. 5274, bills that address the problems stemming from the 24-hour registered nurse requirement for small rural hospitals that was originally required under title 18 of the Social Security Act.

A permanent waiver of this requirement was permitted prior to 1980, for rural hospitals that could not meet the 24-hour requirement due to a lack of qualified personnel in the area. The Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act made the waiver temporary, and subsequent regulations provided for a 1-year waiver based on the State agency's certification of a hospital's good faith efforts to meet the requirement.

Approximately 17 of the 26 rural hospitals affected by the waiver are located in Texas. The alternative to losing the provider of services classification provided by the permanent waiver is the termination of medicare benefits which are the fiscal backbone of many of these hospitals. When the temporary waiver expires, most of these facilities will be forced to close. This drastic action does not serve the best interests of a rural, and most often, isolated population. The intent of my legislation does not advocate providing health care at the expense of the safety of the patient. Rather, it recognizes the fact that it is more prudent to keep a rural hospital open than to cut off its major source of funds.

The pertinent question to be asked is whether we want to provide health care for rural Americans? Obviously the answer is "Yes."●

LOS ANGELES HONORS WILLIAM R. ROBERTSON

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, rarely does one find a person who unselfishly takes time out from his own work to devote himself to helping his fellow man, who dedicates his life to the causes and concerns of his community. William R. Robertson is just such a man, and I invite my colleagues to join me and the city of Los Angeles in honoring him on his birthday Sunday for his long years of service.

Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley spoke on behalf of the citizenry when he described William Robertson as a "long time friend of Los Angeles who has given so much to each of us." It is a well-deserved accolade for Bill who is not a native Californian but hails from St. Paul, Minn., where he received his education in the public schools.

Bill is now executive secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor of the AFL–CIO a position earned after many years of experience in the rank and file. He first began his rise through the labor ranks when he joined the hotel-restaurant and bartenders union in St. Paul and subsequently held positions with that union in two other States, Illinois and Idaho.

Bill then arrived in California and made it his home. His activism in labor continued without pause as he was elected president in 1957 of the San Fernando Valley Hotel-Restaurant and Bartender Local No. 694. He served in that capacity for 10 years until 1967. He then joined the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor where he served as assistant executive secretary-treasurer before assuming his present position in 1975. To top off his career, Bill was elected vice president of the California Labor Federation in 1976.

In addition Bill decided to augment his work experience by studying for and receiving a certificate of labor studies from UCLA. He also has found time to participate in a spectrum of community organizations, taking on duties which range from being a member of the School of Education Advisory Committee and the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut to serving on the boards of the Community Television of Southern California, the Los Angeles Urban League, and the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee. Other organizations in which Bill serves as a member or a commissioner deal with energy concerns. These include the Congressional Advisory Committee on Liquefied Natural Gas, the advisory committee to the State Legislature's Committee on Energy Policy and Implementation, Los Angeles County Energy Commission, and the Los Angeles Ad Hoc Committee on Energy Conservation.

He has acted on his interest in economic and consumer issues through membership in the Los Angeles County economic development program and the Consumer Federation of California. Bill also pursues humanitarian causes as an officer in the United Way and as a board member of the St. Jude Children's Research Hospital Foundation and the Foundation for People, Inc.

In recognition of his distinguished years of work and community service, the Southwestern University School of Law bestowed an honorary doctorate upon William Robertson. It is an appropriate honor for a person who has shown his care for his city through years of devoted service to its citizens. On Sunday I will join my fellow Los Angelenos in spirit when they wish a happy birthday to William R. Robertson as well as thank him for his tireless service. Here is hoping we in California benefit from many more years of his dedicated work.●

ABOLITION OF DIVERSITY JURISDICTION: AN IDEA WHOSE TIME HAS COME?

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, the National Legal Center for the Public Interest recently published a monograph that I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues. It is entitled, "Abolition of Diversity Jurisdiction: An Idea Whose Time Has Come?"

I especially recommend this publication because of its unique debate format, in which it presents the arguments both for and against abolition of diversity jurisdiction in a most enlightening manner. Arguing for abolition of diversity is Caldwell Butler, our esteemed former colleague who recently retired from Congress to practice law in Virginia, and who while a Member of Congress sponsored legislation to abolish diversity which was passed by the House. Writing for retention is Arizona practitioner John P. Frank, who has testified several times on this issue before Congress, and who is head of the Committee to Retain Diversity Jurisdiction, a national organization.

The publication also contains a preface by Senator JOHN EAST of North Carolina, an introduction by our colleague Representative ROBERT KASTENMEIER of Wisconsin, and an informative appendix by Chief Justice Vincent L. McKusick of the Maine Supreme Judicial Court.

Mr. Speaker, as efforts to eliminate diversity jurisdiction continue, Members of Congress would do well to consider the National Legal Center monograph for its excellent presentation of the opposing arguments.

JUDGE EDWARD J. GARCIA

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to applaud the Senate for its recent confirmation of Judge Edward J. Garcia to the U.S. District Court from the Eastern District of California.

Throughout Judge Garcia's distinguished legal career, he has demonstrated his complete commitment to the public by serving their interest in some capacity for the past 25 years. After graduating with honors from a rigorous course of night classes at McGeorge School of Law in 1958, Judge Garcia immediately was appointed to the post of deputy district attorney for Sacramento County. He served in the prosecutor's office for 13 years and as chief deputy district attorney during his last 3.

Judge Garcia's judicial experience has provided him with the appropriate temperament and insight to serve on the Federal bench. According to the Sacramento County Bar's judicial evaluation poll for November 1983, Judge Garcia received the highest rating of all the judges on his court. He has gained the respect and confidence of his colleagues during his 12-year tenure as a municipal court judge. This fact is underscored as Judge Garcia's colleagues elected him to serve as presiding judge of the district four times. He is the only Sacramento County municipal court judge in recent memory to have received such an honor.

In addition, Judge Garcia has been involved actively in statewide judicial affairs. He is a past vice president of the California Judges Association. Judge Garcia serves as the vice chairman of California's Center for Judicial Education and Research. This organization seeks to provide continuing education opportunities to judges at all levels in California. Judge Garcia also has donated generously of his time by teaching at the judicial college.

In conclusion, I believe that the confirmation of Judge Garcia was based on extraordinary merit, tremendous professional accomplishments, and a deep-seated belief in public service.●

THORNE AUCHTER

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, as ranking minority member of the Health and Safety Committee, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the impending resignation of Thorne Auchter and to commend Mr. Auchter for the job he has done as Assistant Secretary for Occupational Safety and health. The Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) used to be and may still remain one of the more controversial of Federal regulatory agencies. Today, however, thanks to changes initiated by Mr. Auchter, the level of controversy has declined and OSHA effectiveness in on the upswing.

The most looked at indicator of workplace illness and injury is the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) data about the workplace. From 1980 to 1982, the number of workers injured annually fell by 14 percent. The injury/illness rate dropped in 1982 to the lowest level ever recorded. Fewer men and women were injured on the job in 1982 than in any other year of the past decade. And that trend manifested itself in 1981 in a time of rising employment. According to BLS, only one-sixth of the 1982 decline can be attributed to fewer hours worked in the statistically more dangerous occupations.

Much of the credit for these improvements must be given to Thorne Auchter's policies. His emphasis has been on identifying and seeking out major workplace hazards and correcting them in a cooperative rather than in a confrontational manner. His more effective utilization of personnel and of "carrot and stick approaches to employers has led to prompter abatement of hazards than was the case in the past when lengthy and costly litigation frequently delayed necessary corrections for years.

With 3 million workplaces under its jurisdiction and 1,200 enforcement personnel, OSHA obviously cannot be everywhere at once. It makes sense, therefore, to focus on high risk places first. Nowadays OSHA inspections concentrate on those manufacturing industries, such as fabricated metals and machinery, as well as the construction industry where commonsense and statistical data alike suggest more serious workplace hazards are likely to exist, rather than on service and retail businesses that by nature are less dangerous. In fiscal year 1983, OSHA conducted more workplace inspections than it had since 1976. The key is that almost 80 percent of these were in high hazard workplaces. Inspections combined with the federally funded consultation visits and the outreach programs by OSHA's area offices have resulted in OSHA's having a higher profile in American workplaces in fiscal year 1983 than in any year in the history of the agency.

By giving his agency strong management and effective management support systems, by bringing the States which administer their own occupational safety and health programs into a partnership with OSHA, by expanding significantly the numbers of persons trained in safety and health, Mr. Auchter has made OSHA more effective in removing on-the-job hazards from America's workplaces.

I congratulate Thorne Auchter for a job well done, and wish him well in his future endeavors.●

TRIBUTE TO BASIL A. DESIDERIO

HON. FRANK HARRISON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Basil A. Desiderio of Plymouth who will be honored as State deputy of the 62,000 member Pennsylvania State Council Knights of Columbus on Saturday evening, April 7, 1984, at Gus Genetti's Best Western Hotel and Convention Center, Wilkes-Barre.

A native of Wilkes-Barre, Basil Desiderio was elected to this prestigious post in 1982 and reelected in 1983, following a highly successful first term as State deputy of and a distinguished career in the Knights of Columbus. His many posts have included two terms as grand knight of Plymouth Council No. 984, four terms as district deputy of district No. 29, one term as chairman of the board of district deputies of northeastern Pennsylvania, State program director, State community activities director, associate membership director, New Council development director, and two terms as State treasurer.

In addition to his many other distinguished assignments, Mr. Desiderio continues to be an active member of the Bishop William J. Hafey Assembly Fourth Degree Knights of Columbus, Wilkes-Barre, holding virtually every office in the assembly including two terms as faithful navigator. He is also a former district marshal of the Fourth Pennsylvania District Calvert Province and a former administrative coordinator of the five-State jurisdictional area of the entire Calvert Province. In 1980, Basil Desiderio was appointed by supreme knight, Virgil C. Dechant, New Haven, Conn., to assume the duties of Master of Fourth Pennsylvania District Calvert Province encompassing 17 fourth degree assemblies in the 15 county area of northeastern and central Pennsylvania, a post he held until being elected to his first term as State deputy.

As a general contractor, Mr. Desiderio is also president of the Masonry Contractors Association of northeastern Pennsylvania and a member of the zoning and planning commission of Larksville Borough. This distinguished gentleman also holds membership in numerous religious, professional, civic, and fraternal organizations. He is a faithful member of St. Casimir's Church, Lyndwood, its Holy Name Society and Usher's Club.

Basil Desiderio answered the call of duty during World War II and served with honor and distinction, seeing action in the European theater of operation.

Mr. Desiderio and his wife, the former Isabelle Uravich, are the parents of three children, Donna, a registered nurse, of Chicago, Ill.; Charles, of Larksville and Basil, Jr., at home. He and his wife are also the proud grandparents of three grandsons, Jonathon, Andrew, and Charles Desiderio of Larksville.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House this fine man and outstanding citizen who has dedicated his life to community service through his activities in the fraternal brotherhood of the Knights of Columbus.●

A MAN FOR ALL SEASONS

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, last weekend in the U.S. Virgin Islands, the St. Thomas-St. John Chamber of Commerce honored Isidor Paiewonsky for his 40 years of service to that organization and for his many, many contributions to our community. Isidor is a very special man: successful in business, meticulous in his historical research, most generous in his many philanthropic activities and genuinely devoted to the betterment of the U.S. Virgin Islands. The breadth of his intelligence is matched only by the depth of his compassion. I am proud and privileged to be his friend and I would like to share with my colleagues an editorial written about Isidor in one of our local newspapers, the Daily News, which helps to describe this remarkable man.

The article follows:

[From the Daily News of the Virgin Islands, Mar. 27, 1984]

MAN FOR ALL SEASONS

Isidor Paiewonsky; businessman, historian, environmentalist, community activist, philanthropist, story-teller par excellence, preserver of the past, watchdog for the future.

In these roles and others, Isidor Paiewonsky has contributed immensely to the betterment of the Virgin Islands community.

And so it was fitting that the St. Thomas-St. John Chamber of Commerce chose to honor him last weekend for his 40 years of service to that organization and his countless contributions to the people of these islands.

We feel a special sense of pride in the honors bestowed upon man, for he is part of the Daily News family. For 11 years he has been writing his History Corner. Few people realize the lengths to which he goes to unearth still-hidden bits of our past, present them to Virgin Islanders of today and preserve them for Virgin Islanders of tomorrow. In doing so he makes an incalculable contribution to all of us.

But regardless of his ties to this newspaper, we would feel a special sense of satisfaction in the chamber's decision to honor Isidor Paiewonsky. He demonstrates qualities that we wish were evident in more people in these islands; the courage to speak out even if his views are unpopular, a desire to right what he sees as wrongs, a passionate commitment to the free-enterprise system, a willingness to listen as well as espouse his own views, a realization that good sesthetics make good economics.

In his speech before 400 friends and well-wishers at Saturday night's dinner-dance, Paiewonsky called upon the business community to organize politically to make its weight felt in the upcoming senatorial election. We think he's got a good idea.

The business community could deliver thousands of crucial votes to people who have a similar commitment to strengthening the job-producing private sector, particularly people who know what it is to meet a payroll and could be counted upon to deal responsibly with the fiscal crisis facing these islands.

We don't believe that what's good for any given business is necessarily good for the Virgin Islands, to paraphrase an infamous line. But given the enormous problems confronting us, especially on the financial front, we believe we would benefit from the business community exercising more political interest and more political clout.●

NATION OBSERVES NATIONAL BAKE WEEK

HON. MARTY RUSSO

OF ILLINOIS

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, April 2-9 marks the observance of "National Bake Week" in towns and cities around our country. This year's theme is, "Kids in the Kitchen, a Family Baking Affair." Sponsored by Chicago Metallic, manufacturers of Village Bakalon, National Bake Week stresses family togetherness, kitchen safety, and the use of math and science skills that kids learn in school. Also available is a bake book entitled, "Kids in the Kitchen," which includes 13 winning recipes and illustrations by children around the country.

This year's spokesperson is 10-year-old Emily Giuliani of Michigan, who today is visiting Washington, D.C. Emily, who has been baking professionally since she was 5 years old, is touring the country, appearing on television and holding interviews.

Proclamations have been issued on National Bake Week, such as this one by Mayor Tom Bradley of Los Angeles:

Whereas baking is a wholesome, educational activity that encourages individuality as well as teamwork, creativity as well as discipline;

Whereas more than 2 million people across the Nation participated in last year's celebration of National Bake Week;

Whereas the celebration of baking as a family activity will encourage young people to learn new skills and promote stronger family ties; and

Whereas the promotion of such ties and the encouragement of such skills as reading, measuring, developing new ideas, following directions in young people is in the interest of this community; a community of families: therefore, I proclaim . . . National Bake Week. . . .

I know my colleagues join me in applauding the goals and observance of National Bake Week and in welcoming Emily to the Capitol.●

SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS OF SERVICE

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, this year the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) celebrates 75 years of commitment and service to the United States. I would like to commend the NAACP, one of America's premier civil rights organizations, for the many contributions it has made to our society in behalf of all Americans, of all races, colors, and creeds.

I applaud the efforts of the NAACP over the years. They have reminded this country of its founding principles: equality and justice for all.●

TRIBUTE TO CLEM J. MALINOWSKI

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to your attention the exemplary community service of Mr. Clem J. Malinowski. Mr. Malinowski was a driver for Greyhound Bus lines for 34 years, beginning in 1949 and ending with his retirement in 1983. During those years, he traveled nearly 3 million miles on Pennsylvania"s highways with an outstanding safety record.

His service to the people of Pennsylvania has been invaluable as he provided them with safe and dependable transportation for many years. His example of loyal community service is one which should inspire workers in all occupations to strive for a similar level of excellence in the performance of their own duties.●

MAYOR SEWELL STEPS DOWN

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, Mayor Earl Sewell of Lancaster, Tex., after 10 years on the Lancaster City Council—6 of them as mayor—has decided to step down after the April 7, 1984, municipal election. The article which follows from a recent edition of the Lancaster News details many of Mayor Sewell's accomplishments and contributions to his community during his tenure. I commend this review of his achievements to my colleagues and the people he has served:

END OF AN ERA: AFTER 10 YEARS, MAYOR EARL SEWELL STEPPING DOWN

When Lancaster City Council convenes for their first council session following the April 7 election, Lancaster Mayor Earl Sewell will step aside from a position he has held for six years. And when he leaves that center chair on council row many feel the city will be left a tremendous void in terms of the leadership, professionalism and foresight he has provided Lancaster during his public service stay.

For 10 years, four as a councilman, Sewell has served for the City of Lancaster. Every other Monday night, plus hundreds of other special or workship sessions he has contributed his time, leadership, and expertise. And they don't get paid down there.

Born and raised in Wills Point on a farm he still maintains with his brother, Sewell first moved to Lancaster "by accident" in 1964, the same year he joined Dwight Sleeper's insurance firm. His is now the president and general manager of Sleeper-Sewell Insurance in Dallas.

His first civic involvement came with the Lion's Club. He started meeting people "and as time came by, I became interested politically."

Earl Sewell first became involved with the Lancaster City Council in 1973, when he and several other citizens became disgruntled over some housing decisions, government housing, approved by city fathers. "We felt like Lancaster had a lot of potential for growth," explained the mayor, "and in some cases it was headed in the wrong direction."

At that point, said Sewell, he in no way had any long-term plans. During his first year he was elected mayor pro-tem and he served for three more years. It was at that time he called it quits. After four years, he felt he had fulfilled his urge and duty and decided not to run again. "After I got into it, I enjoyed it. But at times it was very frustrating," admitted Sewell looking back on his first four years. After sitting out a year, he was encouraged by friends to run for mayor in 1978. He has been there ever since.

Although few will argue his accomplishments, the mayor is not without his critics, some who say he is often stubborn, abrupt with individuals at council meetings and highly opinionated. Proponents say that might appear to be true in the short run for those who rarely attend council sessions. Those who have seen council sessions, Lancaster's and others, on a consistent basis, say they "have never seen a better run council meeting." One thing is for sure, under Mayor Sewell, council sessions have been as professional and tightly-reined as is possible. Without apology, the mayor has always said that has been his intent.

He is adamant about running a city and council meetings in a professional manner.

"It is my belief we should project an image to the young folks of our community that we are running the biggest business in our city," says Sewell. "You may lose your best friend in that (mayor) position. I have always voted my conscience, not what's best for my neighbors, or a certain neighborhood, but what's best for the overall community. Sometimes that is not very popular."

"If Earl Sewell has a fault," says John Marshall, former Lancaster City Manager (1975-1980) "it's that he is strong-willed. That can be a fault or it can be an asset. With Earl, I think of it as an asset."

Dick Hill, a fellow councilman for the past four years and one who admits to a confrontation or two between the pair, says. "He is very direct and some people have trouble dealing with directness. He feels it is his responsibility to conduct the council meetings as professionally as possible."

"In a couple of words, I would characterize Earl Sewell as a strong leader," says Marshall. "He is the kind of leader by which I attribute part of my management style. He could tell you what you are doing wrong, but then support you later. He was always there for you to bounce ideas off of.

"I think as much as anything, he has had the time and desire to run the city. He takes a lot of time to represent Lancaster in various functions. I always thought he projected a good image. If anything, he kept representing Lancaster in a good light when not much was going on. And now a lot is happening which can be directly attributed to him," Marshall said.

Putting Lancaser out front in Dallas and the area has always been a belief of Earl Sewell.

"We need to identify ourselves as a community. We need to take the positive approach. We are a good, quality community and it has always been my philosophy to let people know we're proud of Lancaster."

Earl Sewell's contributions to Lancaster are many. He personally takes credit for very little, but those who have stayed close to Lancaster are quick to point out the many accomplishments during the mayor's time in office.

Among the more significant projects begun or completed during the mayor's civic career: Midway Park General Hospital; the widening of the bridge over I-35; the widening and paving of new Beltline Rd., a project that was significantly moved up in expected time of completion; merit pay system for the city; expansion of library; the new police and fire facilities, water system improvement; creation of airport and park boards and the planned expansion of each area; completion of Town Square remodeling.

In addition, he was the major force in creating a cooperative effort between cities in southwest Dallas County, by establishing monthly meetings between the various municipalities' mayors and city managers. He has also served as president of the Lancaster Business Development Corporation; on the board of trustees for Midway Park Hospital; for two terms on the original county tax appraisal board; and for four years on the county open space committee.

He also is a past president of the Lion's Club, Lancaster Chamber of Commerce, Lancaster Housing Finance Corporation and the Lancaster Industrial Development Authority. Suffice to say he has done more for Lancaster in ten years them most of the citizens of this town will do in a lifetime.

Earl Sewell has been running the Lancaster City Council meetings for six years now and there is no doubt in his mind the time to step down is now. Three terms is more than enough, he has said, ever before he was elected for a third term in 1982.

"I have always felt any elected official should not serve in one capacity more than three terms. Now, he says, "It's time for someone new with new ideas and concepts, to see what they can do to see our community prosper and grow."

The mayor is leaving with a good taste in his mouth. "I feel very good about how the community has come the past six years. That's a tribute to the citizens." Of the growth now apparent in Lancaster, the mayor says it was inevitable. The job was in shaping it. "There is no choice but to grow. So let's develop in a manner that is good for the community.

"I have enjoyed what I've done. I appreciate the fact the citizens of Lancaster allowed me to serve," he says.

Asked how he would like his ten years of public service to be remembered, Sewell said, he has no yearning to be singled out for work many citizens have done over the years. "I did not do it for a monument," he said smiling. "If I made some contributions to the betterment of Lancaster in some way, then that's all I care about. I hope I didn't stay too long."

Some may feel he stayed too long. Most however, realize Lancaster probably would not have made the strides it has over the past several years without Earl Sewell effectively leading the way.

"I think he'll be missed greatly," says E. H. Sheffield, executive vice president of the Lancaster Chamber of Commerce. His imprint however will remain a long time. "Not only his accomplishments readily available, but he's been able to do some positive things that are going to affect this community for many years."

Marshall agrees. "It's going to take a while for anyone to pick up where Earl leaves off. It is going to take a pretty special individual."

Earl Sewell probably won't get a monument with his name stamped on it for his contributions, but his mark, in more intangible ways, is certainly felt by Lancaster and will be for a long time.●

McADORY FIFTH GRADERS SALUTE AMERICA

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, April 3, 1984

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, on March 6, 1984, the fifth graders of McAdory School in Jefferson County, Ala., gave a patriotic program entitled "This is America" before the parent-teacher association.

I would like to salute these talented young people and their teachers for such a fine, outstanding presentation and display of patriotism. Costumed in red, white, and blue, and wearing "Uncle Sam" hats, the students presented a choral and verse arrangement relating their pride in America. Their moving performance drew a standing ovation from a packed house of parents, faculty, and friends.

It is important that this country's youth be instructed in America's rich musical and narrative works. I commend the fifth grade teachers Rutha Bolden, Sally Clements, Murlene Heilman, Joyce McCulley, and Ellen Northcutt, for a job well done in coordinating and producing the patriotic program.

McAdory School is fortunate to have such outstanding teachers as these fine ladies among their faculty.

Principal Nell Salamone and Assistant Principal Ben Burger deserve a standing ovation for their efforts in offering these young Americans the opportunity to present this fine show of American spirit.

Mr. Speaker, America's greatness stems from events such as this program. Interpretations of patriotism give new meaning to our great heritage, and help insure that our young generation will be able to pass on this wonderful heritage to others.

I applaud the efforts of everyone involved in "This is America" at McAdory School for a job well done, and extend to the school faculty and students my best wishes for all future endeavors.●

SENATE—Wednesday, April 4, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, March 26, 1984)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights * * * to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."—Declaration of Independence.

Lord God of history, source of all power and authority, we thank Thee for the vision of our forebears who understood these fundamentals of a God-ordered world—the people, sovereign under God—government accountable to the people. May we remember Lord, that when God is removed from the equation, the system breaks down—the people lose their sovereignty—government becomes autocratic and human rights are meaningless.

Help us not to forget Thee, Lord, and the bountiful grace which Thou hast lavished upon us. Help us to take Thee seriously and emulate those who laid on the line their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor for the beliefs which conceived this Republic. Deliver us from the idolatry which absolutizes that which is relative and temporal, and relativizes that which is absolute and eternal. In the name of Him who is the same yesterday, today and forever. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the two special orders in favor of Senators today, there will be a time for the transaction of routine morning business until 11 a.m. At 11 a.m., we will resume consideration of the unfinished business, which is the supplemental appropriations bill.

Mr. President, the leadership on this side feels that we have made good progress on this measure. I wish to especially commend the managers on both sides, particularly Senator KASTEN and Senator INOUYE, and the others who have been involved. We have disposed of a great number of amendments. But I regret to say that a review of the situation suggests that there is still a great number of amendments to deal with. So, Mr. President, I reluctantly but necessarily wish to say that we will be in late tonight and every night this week, if that is necessary, to try to finish the supplemental. We will be in on Saturday, if necessary, to finish the supplemental.

So for the benefit of those Senators who are listening to me in their offices or elsewhere, and those who will hear these unwelcome words through their staffs, may I repeat, it is essential, in the opinion of the leadership on this side, that we finish the supplemental this week, and that in order to do so Senators should be on notice of late sessions every night this week and of a Saturday session.

I hope Members will notice I did not say the possibility of a Saturday session. If we have not finished the supplemental, it is the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to be in on Saturday.

Mr. President, after that should come a budget package. I will have a further announcement to make in that respect a little later.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. I yield the remainder of my time to the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no further need for my time. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. President, I thank the minority leader for yielding his time to me. I assume in yielding back the time, that encompasses the leadership time on both sides.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is correct.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR KASTEN

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

VOTING PRACTICES IN THE UNITED NATIONS—AFGHANISTAN AND CAMBODIA

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today I am delivering the third in a series of statements on the voting practices in the United Nations. Today's address concerns two formerly nonalined countries which have been brutally invaded and occupied by Communist powers. I refer to Afghanistan, which suffers from the cruel occupation of the Soviet Army, and Cambodia, occupied by the armed forces of Communist Vietnam.

I believe it is of utmost importance for Congress and the American people to be aware of which nations condemned these brutal Communist acts of aggression and which nations by their actions endorsed the same acts of aggression. I am happy to observe that large majorities of the U.N. General Assembly joined with the United States and the other democracies in voting to condemn both these instances of totalitarian aggression.

However, let me emphasize that the two separate U.N. resolutions concerning these acts of aggression fail to name the aggressors, the Soviet Union and Vietnam. Undoubtedly this gave certain nonalined nations greater courage to vote to condemn the aggression.

Mr. President, April is a month of profoundest joy and deepest sadness for the people of Cambodia. This month the Cambodians observe their lunar new year, a time in their Buddhist tradition for sensing the human being's place in the rhythm of nature, and for expressing undying hope in physical and spiritual renewal. April is also the month when, 9 years ago, the Cambodia holocaust began. It was April 1975 when the Communist Khmer Rouge forces captured Phnom Penh and began a program of ideologically conceived mass murder, causing the deaths of probably more than 2 million—some authorities estimate 3 million—out of 7 million Cambodians.

It is timely for us to recognize that the Cambodians continue to suffer gravely. Their most basic human rights, including the very right to life of displaced civilians along the Thai border, are being violated. Their political autonomy is denied and their very survival as a nation is threatened by the military occupation regime of the Vietnamese Communists, with its nearly 200,000 troops on Cambodian soil.

My hope is that the civilized world will vow never to forget the Khmer Rouge holocaust, will pay heed to the ongoing injustices and threats to international peace being committed by the Vietnamese occupation regime, and will resolve to persist in a long and difficult struggle to bring peace and renewal to Cambodia.

To understand the situation in Cambodia today, we must banish a whole complex of misunderstandings that the Vietnamese occupiers would like to popularize. At maximum, the Vietnamese Communists are seeking to gain acceptance of the notion that through their military defeat of the Khmer Rouge in 1979, they actually have set Cambodia on a road toward economic, cultural, even moral renewal. Minimally, Hanoi would like to have its occupation of Cambodia legitimized in the international community through a sort of pseudo-pragmatic acceptance of their presence and behavior as the lesser of two evils when compared with the Khmer Rouge.

Hanoi is trying with all its might to disassociate itself in public perceptions from the Khmer Rouge regime that it first helped to install and then ousted by massive military invasion. The Vietnamese are trying to assign all of the blame, a great part of which they share, to Khmer Rouge leader Pol Pot.

The Vietnamese Communists for the time being are entrenched militarily in Cambodia, but they have failed to gain much diplomatic acceptance, outside of the Soviet bloc, of their invasion and occupation of their neighbor. Probably this is due in part to the lack of sympathy Communist Vietnam has found from influential writers and publications on the left that had opposed U.S. policies in Indochina before 1975.

Elizabeth Becker, writing last year in the Washington Post in a series of lengthy articles based on both experience in Cambodia before 1975 and travel to Cambodia as recently as 1982, asserted:

> Many of the men now running the government for the Vietnamese occupiers are the same bureaucrats and officers who ran the government for Pol Pot. Most importantly, they are ruling the same Communist Party that Pol Pot led for over 16 years.

Besides this report by Ms. Becker, Mr. President, there are many other grim indications that the similarities between Vietnamese Communist occupation and Khmer Rouge Communist rule are far more substantial than the differences.

Substantial majorities of the U.N. General Assembly have condemned the Vietnamese occupation of Cambodia every year since 1979. The same series of U.N. resolutions has put forward a constructive set of proposals for the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Cambodia and for internationally supervised, free elections to return self-determination to the Cambodian people. Overwhelming majority votes for the resolutions on Cambodia have been brought about not only by the persuasiveness of journalistic reports such as those I have just mentioned, but also by the marvelously organized and articulated campaign waged by the resolutions' principal sponsors, the nations of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations: Thailand, Singapore, Malaysia, Indonesia, and the Philippines.

Yesterday, in my remarks on the treatment of Israel in the United Nations, I lamented the fact that large numbers of U.N. members were willing, in the context of the campaign to delegitimize Israel, to vote to subvert the fundamental principles of the U.N. charter.

Happily, in the instance of Cambodia this is not so. As detailed in the very enlightening new "Report to Congress on Voting Practices in the United Nations," prepared by the State Department and the U.S. mission to the United Nations, only a tiny number of states outside the Soviet bloc cast negative or abstaining votes on the ASEAN resolutions. Last year, 105 U.N. members voted in favor of the ASEAN resolution on Cambodia, with only 23 opposed and 19 abstaining.

Among the small minority that voted "no" on the Cambodia resolution, together with Vietnam and the Soviet Union, were Libya, Syria, and Angola. Congo—Brazzaville—which voted "no" is a U.S. aid recipient. U.S. economic assistance also goes to Guyana, which voted against the resolution.

A major recipient of U.S. aid, India, abstained on this resolution. India is also one of the few non-Communist countries that exchange ambassadors with the Vietnamese puppet regime in Phnom Penh. Several African countries that receive significant U.S. aid also abstained, including Zimbabwe, Tanzania, Uganda, Ghana, and Madagascar.

Our neighbors in the Americas, Mexico and Panama, likewise were among the very few U.N. members to abstain on the Cambodia vote. These U.N. members chose not only to isolate themselves from the United States and the democracies that usually vote on the same side of the issues as the United States, but also to isolate themselves from the great majority of nonalined states.

Mr. President, the plight of Afghanistan closely parallels that of Cambodia. The country has been invaded by the army of a Communist power, in this case the Soviet Union itself rather than a surrogate.

The sufferings of the innocent in Afghanistan has been massive and appalling. More than one-fifth of the pre-invasion population of the country is estimated to be in refugee status in neighboring Pakistan and Iran: This translates into well over 2 million Afghans subsisting on refugees' rations in Pakistan and about 1 million likewise languishing in Iran.

In her address on the Afghan situation during last year's General Assembly, Ambassador Kirkpatrick cited manifold human rights abuses by the Soviets in Afghanistan, documented by numerous independent, international monitoring organizations. The ultimate Soviet intention toward Afghanistan, she pointed out, is "to absorb the country economically and culturally into the Soviet Empire."

To its credit, the U.N. General Assembly's response to the invasion of Afghanistan also has been similar to its response to the Cambodian situation: Overwhelming majorities have voted in successive assemblies to demand the withdrawal of foreign forces and to reaffirm the right of the Afghan people to determine their own form of government.

Another parallel to the Cambodian situation is that a subgroup of the nonalined group of nations, in this instance the Islamic Conference group of nations, in this instance the Islamic Conference instead of ASEAN, takes the lead in orchestrating support for the resolution on Afghanistan. Last year, the majority voting for this constructive resolution was even greater than the number voting for the resolution in Cambodia. The tally was 116 in favor, including the United States; 20 opposed; and 17 abstaining.

As I mentioned earlier, however, our U.N. delegation finds it regrettable that in both of these resolutions, the aggressor is not named. Failure to mention the Soviet Union and Vietnam in the resolutions undoubtedly gives certain nonalined nations greater courage to vote affirmatively.

The core of opposition to the resolution on Afghanistan once again was the Soviet bloc. Syria and Libya broke ranks with their fellow members of the Islamic Conference in order to vote with the Soviets. India isolated itself from virtually all of the world's democracies by abstaining. Mali and Uganda, both recipients of U.S. aid significant for the size of their countries, also abstained.

Mr. President, I believe Americans care about the fate of the Cambodians and the fate of the Afghans. The annual U.N. resolutions are relevant to their fate. We can look with satisfaction upon the fact that a majority of United Nations members have voted to condemn Communist aggression against these peoples. However, we must not overlook the fact that some nations chose by their actions to endorse those acts of aggression.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table showing those countries which voted against the U.S. position on these issues and are scheduled to receive U.S. foreign assistance in fiscal year 1985 be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. This table also includes a list of those countries which abstained on these issues, and who are scheduled to receive assistance in fiscal year 1985. I include the countries that abstained because, with reference to both of these issues, an abstention is nearly as bad as a negative vote. This table, in addition to showing the fiscal year 1985 proposed foreign assistance levels, also shows the current-year levels of assistance and the historic levels of assistance from 1946 through the fiscal year 1985 proposal.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SYMMS). The Senator will state it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Do I have time this morning? I think I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no special order for the Senator. However, the Senator from Wisconsin has 4 remaining minutes which he could yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to yield to the Senator from Arizona what time he may desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 3 minutes and 37 seconds.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am happy to yield whatever time the Senator needs. I have 15 minutes and will not require all that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Go ahead.

Mr. PROXMIRE. No; I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Go ahead. I wish to hear what the Senator has to say.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

REPEAL THE WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as the debate proceeds on funds for the defense of Central America, a debate that focused attention on the War Powers Resolution, I call the attention of our colleagues to the fact that I have introduced a bill, S. 2030, to repeal that statute.

In my opinion, the War Powers Resolution is unconstitutional, but we may never have a definitive court decision on that question because the judicial branch usually ducks political questions. The courts believe these problems are better left for resolution between the two political branches, the President and Congress.

In order to avoid a terrible constitutional confrontation at some time of grave international crisis in the future, when a firm and prompt U.S. response is required, I believe we should repeal the War Powers Resolution now. It attempts to deny flexibility to the President in the defense of American citizens and their freedoms. Even if it were not unconstitutional, the War Powers Resolution is impractical and dangerous.

It may cause hesitation at a moment in history when immediate action is necessary. It may encourage and incite this country's adversaries to take action harmful to the vital interests of the American people in the belief that the President will not be able to carry out a sustained response to foreign threats.

Not only does the War Powers Resolution attempt to restrict the engagement of U.S. military forces to no more than 60 days, except for an additional 30 days when needed to remove our forces safely, but it claims to give Congress power to order the President to remove our military units before 60 days are up. Under the terms of the War Powers Resolution, Congress can technically direct the withdrawal of American forces from hostilities 1 hour after the President has deployed them, if Congress is in session and chooses to act with such unusual speed.

Mr. President, the War Powers Resolution runs contrary to all practical experience that had been gained by the Founding Fathers during the War of Independence and by the free people of the United States in the last 207 years. Impediments erected by the Continental Congress nearly lost the Revolutionary War.

The framers of the Constitution, who met in Philadelphia in 1787, knew this fact. They understood from firsthand knowledge that Congress, acting under the supreme military command powers vested in it by the Articles of Confederation, had disrupted and overturned General Washington's plans time after time with disastrous results. The framers wanted to break away from this bad experience and this is one reason why they made the President Commander in Chief of the Nation's military forces when they drafted the Constitution in 1787.

What we often forget today is that the leaders of the new Nation recognized in 1787 that the American people faced tremendous military dangers, both immediately and in the visible future. The United States was surrounded by hostile forces. Spain controlled the mouth of the Mississippi River and blocked free U.S. navigation of the river. She tried to erect a hostile Indian nation between Spanish possessions and the territories of the Thirteen American States.

To the north, Britain still occupied military forts in American territory in direct violation of the Treaty of Paris of 1783. Great Britain also incited Indian raids across the borders of the United States.

Even our recent ally, France, looked upon the United States as little more than a dependent client. France tried to involve us in its own foreign conflicts.

Also, the new Government had to protect U.S. trade, which even in the 1780's already was traveling to all corners of the globe. John Jay commented in the Federalist Papers No. 4 that the U.S. people may well find themselves drawn into a military conflict because of commercial conflicts arising as far away as China and India.

Of course, one answer the Framers provided to meeting these difficulties was national unity. But increased military powers for the National Government did not provide a complete answer. More was needed and that is why the framers established an independent Chief Executive for the Nation, the President, who was vested with all the executive power of the Nation and specifically designated as the Commander in Chief.

Until the 1970's, this was the overwhelming interpretation given by the American people to the Constitution. The President was seen as the national leader who decided the fundamental question of when and where to use American military forces and virtually every President carried out this responsibility. My office has collected over 200 instances in which U.S. Presidents, without any declarations of war, have ordered American military units to engage in hostilities outside the United States in the defense of American citizens and freedoms.

When Congress changed course in the early 1970's and began to claim control over military decisions for itself, it brought humiliation upon the United States and severely damaged our position in the world. Congressionally legislated restrictions have led directly to the total collapse of South Vietnam, to genocide in Cambodia, and to the loss of a neutral, independent Laos. I also attribute Soviet sponsored aggression in Ethiopia, Afghanistan, Angola, Nicaragua, and other areas as stemming in part from the perception of Russian leaders that the United States is so weakened by congressional limitations that we no longer have the ability or will to meet serious challenges while they are manageable.

We can also test the War Powers Resolution against history. What would have happened if President Franklin Roosevelt had been faced with a Congressional War Powers Resolution in 1940 and 1941?

Historians are discovering through recently uncensored materials that it was only the independent and often secret actions of President Roosevelt that enabled the United States to keep some foreign opposition to Nazi Germany alive before Hitler's declaration of war on our country. Congress was not consulted when Roosevelt sent American troops to occupy and establish bases in Greenland and Iceland in 1941 and to cooperate with British armed forces already there. Nazi planes overflew these bases and no one knew with assurance whether or when a German attack was coming. Would Congress have extended President Roosevelt's authority to keep American Marines on these islands after 60 days, as required by the War Powers Resolution? I think not. Remember, Congress had barely agreed to renew the military draft in 1940. The outcome depended on a single vote.

Would Congress have extended President Roosevelt's authority in September 1941 to order American warships to escort and protect British convoys west of Iceland and to destroy German submarines on sight, if it had been compelled to take a vote pursuant to the War Powers Resolution? Again, the answer is surely no. Would Congress have approved of President Roosevelt's action in May 1941, when he secretly lent long-range amphibian planes to Great Britain and assigned 80 Navy airmen to help in British operations to sink the German battleship Bismarck? Again, the answer must be no.

The fact is that if the War Powers Resolution had been on the books in the early 1940's, President Roosevelt could not have kept troops in Greenland, he could not have reinforced the Marines on Iceland, he could not have escorted British shipping in the Atlantic and he could not have taken any of the many actions which prevented a total collapse of resistance to Nazi Germany. The War Powers Resolution would have brought nothing but a total disaster to the democracies in the 1940's.

Mr. President, the point is that the President of our Nation must have flexibility to resist challenges to our freedom in the early stages. The American people cannot count on an often reluctant and divided Congress to act in time to deal with the threats to our Nation's survival. The framers of the Constitution understood that the ultimate decision over the defense of American freedoms must rest with the Commander in Chief.

This is not to say that there are no checks at all on the President. The President does not inherit his position, he must be elected by the people and he must stand for reelection if he wishes to have a second term.

He must get Senate approval for his appointments of Executive officers and he must come to Congress for defense appropriations. Ultimately, there is the check of impeachment.

Every President knows that it is the sovereign people who retain the reins of power, but he has the sworn duty to defend, as well as uphold, the Constitution. He has the right to judge how to defend the Nation in the way he thinks best.

Mr. President, whether it is unconstitutional, as I believe, or a dangerous impediment to taking necessary actions in defense of the freedoms of our citizens and the security of the Nation, the War Powers Resolution should be repealed and I urge other Senators to join Senator DENTON and me in sponsoring S. 2030.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial that appeared in yesterday's Baltimore Sun and a letter I wrote to the editor of that paper relative to it.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RETHINKING WAR POWERS

Ambiguity between the president's role as commander-in-chief and Congress' authority to declare war and finance the military services is as old as the Constitution. This gray area has been the scene of periodic skirmishes between the executive and legislative branches throughout the nation's history. But rarely if ever has the battle been joined more intensely than it now.

First in Lebanon, now in Central America, memories of Vietnam have engendered controversy over how U.S. power can or should be projected abroad. If these questions are left out of control, there is a danger that the national government could be hobbled during a period of crisis.

For this reason, we welcome the efforts by Secretary of State George P. Shultz and Senator Arlen Specter (R, Pa.) to have these serious issues discussed without reference to the passions and details of any one particular conflict situation. One course, which Senator Specter has mentioned, would be joint petition by Congress and the White House asking the Supreme Court to decide the constitutionality of the 1973 War Powers Resolution and related measures. Another, which Secretary Shultz seems to favor, would be an attempt to rewrite the War Powers Resolution in a way to make it more acceptable to the executive branch.

Let it be acknowledged up front that it is unlikely and perhaps undesirable to resolve all the tensions deliberately created in a government based on checks and balances. The Supreme Court has refused in the past to provide advisory opinions to the executive or legislative branches, limiting itself to actual cases and controversies requiring adjudication. It may do so again rather than face a situation where another co-equal branch of government might spurn its advice with impunity.

A more normal way out would be an attempt to rewrite the existing resolution. Obviously, little can be done in an election year. Just as obviously, the election of Walter Mondale or Gary Hart would not change the situation, since both say they would accept the War Powers Resolution.

But if President Reagan is re-elected, the nation would be faced with continuing dispute. Not only has Mr. Reagan refused to accept the War Powers Resolution, but Mr. Shultz has complained that its mere existence pulled the rug out from under the U.S. position in Lebanon. Now the argument is shifting to Central America, and who knows where after that. Clearly this is a war-and-peace matter of such transcendent importance that a thorough review under appropriate circumstances is very much in order.

APRIL 3, 1984.

The EDITOR,
The Baltimore Sun.

DEAR SIR: In the April 3rd issue of your newspaper, you had an editorial entitled, "Rethinking War Powers." I think it is a very good approach to a problem that many of us ever since its passage have felt was against the best interests of the entire American people.

I am going to say a few words on the Senate Floor relative to this subject and I'm going to introduce your editorial as part of it. But, you make a statement that leads me to believe that you are mistaken on the same point that many, many members of the Congress are mistaken.

You say in your opening sentence that, "Congress' authority to declare war and finance the military services is as old as the Constitution." Financing the military services is as old as the Constitution as is Congress's authority to declare war but, we can declare war every five minutes and no troops will move. Only the Commander-in-

Chief, the President, has the Constitutional power to order people to war or to go to war.

In the about 200 times the President has felt it necessary to call out the troops for this, that or the other thing, only five declarations of war have been made and two of them have been in the same war.

What we are engaging in now is a very dangerous debate, based primarily on the assumption, that Congress can actually go to war when it cannot. It can control the funds to wage war, that is true, but, we have never had the courage in the Congress to do that.

I think the most dangerous thing facing us is the idea that 535 people in the Congress would be more responsible in the matter of war than one man, the Commander-in-Chief.

I thank you for your editorial. I hope other newspapers in the country begin to realize, as you have, that there is something wrong with the War Powers Act, and it needs attention.

Sincerely,

BARRY GOLDWATER.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I compliment the distinguished Senator from Arizona for his very cogent remarks this morning. I ask unanimous consent to be added as a cosponsor of his bill to repeal the War Powers Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, do I have a special order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for the duration of the special order.

THE WAR POWERS RESOLUTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, first, I want to say how happy I am that I was on the floor of the Senate when the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) spoke on the War Powers Act.

I have great respect for the fine Senator from Arizona. He is a great Senator and a great American. I happen to disagree with him strongly on the War Powers Act.

I think the Constitution does give Congress the right to declare war, but between the end of World War II and the passage of the War Powers Act, it became a dead letter. We fought a war in Korea, and Congress had nothing to say about that. We went into Korea because the President decided to do so. The same thing happened in Vietnam. Congress had no voice in Vietnam. Although there was overwhelming public disapproval of the war in Vietnam, Congress had no opportunity and no responsibility to decide whether we would go into Vietnam or not.

It is true that the President does have a very important role, and perhaps the most important role, even under the War Powers Act, in conducting whatever hostilities we get into. The War Powers Act gives him leeway for 60 days. But for us to participate in hostile action in a foreign land for more than 60 days, it seems to me, makes a mockery of the power of Congress to declare war.

The War Powers Act does act as a restraining influence on the President.

The notion that we can impeach the President if we disagree with his action in going into war, it seems to me, is a theoretical power, but it is a power we are unlikely to use. We have never used it completely, I guess, President Nixon having resigned; and it would be very rare that we would use it under most extreme circumstances.

So far as appropriations as a restraint are concerned, I have been down that path in the years I have been in the Senate; and Senators are not going to vote against appropriations to save the lives of American troops sent into action by the President. We would be put in an impossible position. We may disapprove of what the President has done, but we are not going to cut off our troops without the supplies, ammunition, and equipment as well as the other support they need to protect themselves.

So it seems to me that maybe the War Powers Act should be changed. I think the Senator from Arizona has made a very telling and effective criticism of it. But I hope we would not simply abolish it outright and leave us in the situation we were in before the War Powers Act was enacted.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the Senator made a couple of points that I have tried and tried to get across to my colleagues and to the American people: that, yes, we do have the power to declare war; but we do not have the power to send troops anyplace.

As I mentioned in my talk, there have been 207 times that Presidents of the United States have called out the troops for this, that, or the other thing, and only five declarations of war, and two of them in one war.

We do have control over the military actions of the President through the purse. I have heard the Senator speak many times in the case of Vietnam, saying we could have ended that war—maybe not the next day, because money runs on; but we certainly have the power and the right and the responsibility to control the expenditure of money.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Theoretically, we do have it.

This Senator recalls vividly, as does the Senator from Arizona, the Vietnam situation, and I supported the Vietnam war all the way through. But I was also aware of the fact that if I had wanted to take some kind of action to cut off the appropriations for our troops in Vietnam, I could not have brought myself to do it under any circumstances, no matter how I felt about the war. I am not going to have our troops in Vietnam dying because they do not have the kind of equipment they need to support them. I am not going to take that kind of responsibility. You have to provide the funds, once they get into action.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I agree with the Senator thoroughly. I do not think such a suggestion would ever pass. But we have the power to do that, if we want to. We do not have the power, under the Constitution, to order troops, aircraft, or ships anywhere to engage in warfare. Only the President can do that.

While I am calling for repeal of the War Powers Resolution, I am perfectly open to ways to change it. I would rather put the powers of war under one man than have them spread through 535 Members of Congress, all of whom have personal or ethnic reasons for wanting to go to war here or not wanting to go to war there. I think that one man, who must live the rest of his life with the responsibility, will give a much better judgment than our collective discussions.

I think that what we are going through now is a perfect example of what this country would go through if we left it up to Congress to make these decisions.

I am wide open for suggestions on what to do with this matter. I just do not happen to think that it is constitutional, but I do not think we can get it through the Supreme Court. They do not act that way.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

PARALLELS IN THE SOVIET'S INHUMANE TREATMENT OF THE UKRAINIAN FAMINE AND THE AFGHAN FREEDOM FIGHTERS STRUGGLE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Democratic leader, Senator BYRD, has spoken out vigorously, forcefully, and frequently to protest the Soviet barbaric invasion of Afghanistan. I join him this morning in protest in connection with a Washington Post column in which columnist George Will describes the inhumane strategy employed by the Soviet authorities against Afghan freedom fighters, and equates the indiscriminate violence toward civilians with the Soviet actions in deliberately and cruelly starving countless Ukrainians at the time of the Ukrainian famine.

Will contends that the Soviet regime has decided in Afghanistan that the only way to win in counterguerrilla warfare is to use a "kind of ruthlessness that only a totalitarian regime will practice." Guerrillas fight with the aid of a local population, and rather than seeking to gain support of the Afghan people, the Soviets have decided to destroy them.

In his column, Mr. Will states:

The Red Army has now been engaged against the Freedom Fighters longer than it was against German Wehrmacht. But what is being done in Afghanistan in 1984 is more akin to the Ukrainian genocide of 1933. Then, as now, Soviet ruthlessness prevailed, and the West's denial reflex kept the unpleasant business out of most minds.

The tragic account of the Afghan struggle details an unlimited and brutal war against an entire population, a war where the intended victims are civilians. Hundreds of thousands of mines have been laid. Writes Mr. Will:

The mines are designed to maim—or kill lingeringly. Soviet tacticians know that wounded persons are a drain on the community.

Not content with causing random suffering among those who do not watch their step, Soviet forces booby-trap household artifacts, such as clocks, in villages they seep through. They also scatter booby-traps made to resemble pens or red toy trucks."

Acccording to the Executive Director of "Doctors Without Borders," Doctor Claude Malhuret, "Their main targets are children, whose hands and arms are blown off.

Similarly, in 1933, Moscow considered it easier to eradicate the civilian population aiding the resistance to Russian Communist control of Ukraine than to attempt the difficult task of winning its support. Forced starvation and execution were the weapons used then; mines and chemical warfare are the weapons used in Afghanistan today. Different weapons—same objectives.

How can we keep denying to our consciences that these injustices continue to take place? We, as champions of the basic human rights of all people in the world, cannot continue to look myopically at allegations of genocidal acts.

I urge us to look beyond our borders and recognize the persecution of numerous groups in our world. We can achieve this recognition by ratifying the Genocide Convention, which will provide us with the tool we need to condemn the morbid act of genocide.

CAN THE UNITED STATES VERIFY SOVIET TREATY COMPLIANCE?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in the view of most Americans the key question in arms control is: Can the United States verify Soviet treaty compliance? Why is this question so crucial? Because if the United States cannot verify Soviet compliance any arms limitation we make with the Soviet Union might become simply unilateral disarmament for the United States. Many Americans feel that if the Soviets can get away with cheating on an arms control treaty and win a significant advantage for their side, they will do exactly that. Even if we do provide a verification system to determine if the Soviets are, in fact, complying with the treaty, if the Soviets know they can violate that system with impunity, many Americans believe the Soviets will cheat. They may very well be right. The logic of arms control hangs heavily on the effectiveness of verification.

So what is the answer? Can the United States verify Soviet treaty compliance? The answer lies in the compliance features of the treaty. It is generally accepted that the Soviets have cheated on a nonnuclear arms control treaty—the Biological Warfare Treaty. The United States and the Soviet Union are parties to the Geneva Protocol of 1925 and the Biological Weapons Treaty of 1972. Under these treaties, both countries agreed not to use biological agents in warfare. In Afghanistan, in 1980, it seems very likely the Soviets violated this treaty. This is such a serious challenge to future arms control agreements that the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace called it "a political time bomb under all future arms control agreements."

Should this Soviet violation blow "taps" on future arms control violations? Well, Mr. President, it should kill future arms control agreements with the Soviet Union that fail to provide specific and detailed verification procedures. The problem with the biological warfare agreement was that it contained virtually no verification provisions. This is precisely why I introduced a resolution in the Senate after the reported use of biological agents by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. The Senate passed that Proxmire resolution without opposition. It called on the President to renounce that treaty and renegotiate a treaty containing specific compliance, that is, verification provisions.

The question is not whether the Soviet Union is guided by the morality of Mother Theresa. We know it is not. The question is whether we can negotiate specific, detailed verification procedures which will assure both sides that they can rely on the arms control limitations as mutually binding. As Common Cause points out in its Guide to Understanding Nuclear Arms Policy, any future nuclear arms control treaty may simply not help in limiting arms by both sides. It can and should also assist the verification procedure by enumerating ground rules to aid the factfinding process. The treaty may and should require cooperation by both sides in assisting and strengthening verification.

Here are three specific examples from the SALT II agreement of how to make verification work. One provision calls for the regular exchange of data on forces that would enable each nation to doublecheck its independent information against an agreed-upon data base. A second requires both superpowers to design aircraft with observable differences such as externally mounted missiles to make identification by satellite easier. A third requires "counting rules" to simplify verification of the treaty's ceilings on multiple warheads.

So the treaty reinforces verification by requiring each superpower to provide the other with constant, ongoing information on compliance.

Do we rely on this Soviet-furnished data for any kind of exclusive knowledge on compliance? Certainly not. Our prime source of data on Soviet compliance comes from our own direct "National Technical Means," which means finding out what the Russians are doing without any help from the Russians. And these means have become both varied and highly impressive. They also provide a solid basis for determining whether the Russians are, in fact, providing us with honest, accurate information. But even here we rely on a degree of cooperation with the Soviet Union. In the 1972 AMB Treaty, both nations agreed not to interfere with national technical means by deliberately concealing activities essential to verification. If the Russians violate this provision, we can and will know it within a reasonable period of time. For our direct intelligence about Soviet compliance, we rely on search-and-find satellites which provide total photographic coverage of the Soviet Union every day. We supplement that with close-look satellites which can zoom in to provide a clearer, more detailed picture. We use multispectral scanners to deal with camouflage or darkness or even underground concealment. We have numerous listening posts that monitor radio signals transmitted by Soviet missiles. We constantly pull all this information together. So what is learned from one source can be checked against what is learned from another.

Now, obviously, Mr. President, no system of verification can be 100 percent. Even if the mechanical equipment were perfect, the human beings who monitor and interpret it are not. We can, and undoubtedly do, occasionally miss nuclear weapons developments in the Soviet Union. The question is whether we are learning enough so that we have a reasonably complete picture of Soviet nuclear quantity, quality, and capability. Take for example the nuclear weapons that constitute the great mass of the Soviet deterrent—their gigantic ICBM force. Consider the observation of verification expert Joseph Kruzel, who wrote in "Verification of SALT II":

It is inconceivable that the Soviets could perform any significant part of this process of designing, testing and deploying an ICBM without being detected by the United States. ICBM's and the nuclear warheads they carry are not small toys that can be easily concealed. They are large fragile and dangerous systems requiring a major effort to build, and that poses an almost impossible task of significant concealment.

Also consider, Mr. President, the testimony of William Colby, the former Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, who last year told our Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense:

In a world with 50,000 nuclear weapons, it is hard to imagine that the secret development of a few more would change the balance of power, even though it might be a breach of contract. Any program which offered the prospect of a strategic advantage to the Soviets by definition would have to be of a size and consequent visibility that we could identify it before it became a direct threat.

Finally, Mr. President, again and again in these speeches I have contended that the most important nuclear arms control treaty we could negotiate by far is the comprehensive test ban treaty. This treaty is critical because it would stop the technological arms race. Here is a prime example of how the treaty itself could advance verification and prevent any significant likelihood of cheating on present limitations on testing. The Carter administration delayed action on the test ban treaty and the Reagan administration has walked away from it since they took office. And yet, under that treaty the Soviets had agreed in principle to exchange geophysical data and were prepared to accept special on-site inspection by foreign observers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an excerpt dealing with the Soviet record of treaty compliance from "Up in Arms," the Common Cause Guide to Understanding Nuclear Weapons Policy, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SOVIET RECORD OF TREATY COMPLIANCE

"I do not believe that the Soviets would enter into any agreement which required them to cheat in order to attain their military objectives, or on which they planned to cheat," said Sidney Graybeal, former U.S. representative to the Standing Consultative Commission, at a Senate hearing in 1979. There is, however, considerable controversy surrounding the Soviet record compliance to date. At issue are several pacts dealing with nuclear arms control—the SALT I accords, the unratified SALT II Treaty, and two test ban treaties—as well as international agreements on biological and chemical warfare.

SALT I ACCORDS

In February 1978, the Department of State released a public report on SALT I compliance. Prepared in response to a Senate committee request and with the tacit approval of the Soviet Union, the report summarized issues addressed during the classified proceeding of the Standing Consultative Commission.

The document discusses eight questions raised by the United States regarding Soviet compliance with SALT I and five questions raised by the Soviet Union regarding U.S. compliance. Three areas of American concern reflect the type of problem addressed and resolved by the SCC:

Launch control facilities: In 1973, the U.S. observed the possible construction of new silos for land-based missiles in violation of SALT I. A Soviet response that the facilities were built to house personnel for launch control programs subsequently was confirmed by U.S. intelligence. Discussion of the matter was closed by the U.S. in 1977.

Air defense system radar: In 1973 and 1974, the U.S. observed a Soviet radar tracking a missile in test flight, indicating a possible effort to use the radar for missile defenses, in violation of the ABM treaty. Although maintaining that the radar had a different, permissible mission, the Soviets curtailed the activity shortly after the issue was discussed by the SCC.

Modern, large ballistic missiles: In early 1975, the U.S. questioned the Soviets' deployment of their large SS-19 missile, a step considered inconsistent with SALT I's ban on converting "light" ICBM launchers to "heavy" ICBM launchers. The U.S. issued its own interpretation of "heavy" during SALT I, but the treaty contained no agreed-upon definition. As a result, deployment was permitted, and the treaty language subsequently was clarified in SALT II.

The record in SALT I reflects a mixed pattern of Soviet behavior, including a willingness to exploit ambiguities and a disregard for unilateral interpretations issued by the United States. In the past, complaints regarding Soviet behavior generally have resulted in the cessation of the objectionable activity or a satisfactory explanation of it. The recent construction of a large Soviet radar installation in Siberia, however, raises new questions about Soviet compliance and suggests a possible violation of provisions of the ABM Treaty. The Reagan Administration reportedly has raised this issue in the SCC.

SALT II TREATY

The unratified status of the SALT II Treaty clouds the compliance question. Despite public allegations of Soviet misconduct, the Reagan Administration was reluctant until recently to raise any formal grievances before the Standing Consultative Commission—an act that would constitute acceptance of the unratified treaty. Controversy surrounding SALT II stems largely from early reports of Soviet missile tests that suggest, to some officials, possible violations of the treaty's limit on the testing and deployment of one new type of ICBM as well as the ban on telemetry encryption during missile tests. Other policymakers, however, take a different view of the available evidence. Rethinking its earlier posture, the Administration has submitted these issues to the SCC for discussion and resolution.

TEST BAN TREATIES

The Threshold Test Ban Treaty (TTB) bars the United States and Soviet Union from testing warheads with yields greater than 150 kilotons. Although the treaty was signed in 1974, its submission to the U.S. Senate was delayed pending the conclusion of a companion treaty in 1976 on peaceful nuclear explosions (PNE).

In 1982, President Reagan withdrew the TTB and PNE treaties from Senate consideration, citing his concern about alleged Soviet violations. According to Administration reports, Soviet tests may have exceeded the 150-kiloton threshold on 14 occasions since the treaties were signed.

These claims have been the subject of much debate in the scientific community. In October 1982, two seismologists, Drs. Lynn Sykes and Jack Evernden, co-authored an article in Scientific American examining the available evidence on Soviet testing. In their judgment, the debate over the size of Soviet tests revolves solely around the choice of scientific methods for obtaining yield estimates. Their research led them to this conclusion:

Using mainly surface waves, we estimated yields of the larger Soviet explosions from 1976, the date that the Threshold Treaty went into effect, through October 1981. None of the computed yields were above the 150 kt threshold. While several of the Soviet tests were close to the 150 kt threshold, we find no evidence that the U.S.S.R. has violated the terms of the Threshold Treaty.

Other scientists take a contrary view, finding substantial evidence of high-yield testing by the Soviet Union. This discrepancy is not surprising to one Pentagon seismologist quoted in Science magazine:

If you start with a philosophical bias that the Soviets are not cheating, the geological data are there to say that. It you start with a philosophical bias that they are cheating the data are there to say that.

Ironically, the Administration's decision to withhold support for the PNE and TTB Treaties prevents the United States from utilizing the very provisions of those treaties that would enhance verification, especially in areas that evidence a relaxation of the Soviets' earlier positions. For example, the Soviets had agreed in principle to exchange geophysical data in connection with the Threshold Test Ban Treaty and were prepared to accept special on-site activities by foreign observers in the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 11 a.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOLDWATER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Z. REED MILLAR, A MAN OF HIGH PRINCIPLES

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, a much honored and respected citizen of Idaho was lost March 11 with the passing in Boise of Z. Reed Millar at the age of 87. He leaves a multitude of friends, admirers, and caring relatives. One of his 34 grandchildren, Dwight P. Hansen, of Boise, is currently serving on my staff as a congressional intern, as a part of his studies at Brigham Young University.

Z. Reed Millar was an unusual combination of high principles, moral commitment, and personal integrity.

He was born October 10, 1896, in American Fork, Utah, and was reared on a farm near Shelley, Idaho. He was one of eight children.

"Z. Reed," as he was known, attended the University of Utah, earning his law degree there in 1926, and returned to Blackfoot, Idaho, with his bride, Urania Berthelson, to practice law. That same year he was elected prosecuting attorney in Bingham County and served two terms.

Z. Reed was chosen to serve on the staff of the State attorney general in 1931, so he moved his young family to Boise, the State capital. He made Boise his permanent residence and practiced law there for 48 years.

Shortly after moving to Boise, his first wife died, leaving three children motherless. A second marrige, to Edna Sorenson, was blessed with an additional three children.

Z. Reed was a member of the American and Idaho Bar Associations. Both his legal and church work were extensive and influential, and he had the opportunity to work with many fine men in these areas. One of his law partners was Marian J. Callister, now the chief judge of the Federal District Court for the District of Idaho. They had preserved a close relationship through their civil affairs and as leaders in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

Z. Reed worked closely with the Idaho State Legislature while he was in Boise. Although not a member of the State legislature, he determined to be involved in moral issues and helped draft many bills which are law today.

He was a charter member of the Allied Civic Forces—a group of individuals committed to abolishing drinking and gambling in Idaho. They acted as advocates for clean and honest living.

Z. Reed Millar served a long career in the Latter-day Saints Church, first as bishop, and later as a counselor to then-Boise Stake President Ezra Taft Benson, former Secretary of Agriculture in President Eisenhower's administration, and currently senior apostle in the Latter-day Saints Church. Later, Z. Reed succeeded Ezra Taft Benson as Stake President for 11 years. In 1950, he organized the Boise Latter-day Saints Institute of Religion which still operates at Boise State University. In 1963, he served on the missionary and home teaching training committee and in 1967, he was selected to be one of the first regional representatives to the Council of the Twelve Apostles of the Latter-day Saints Church.

Z. Reed's interests were not only directed toward civil and religious affairs, but he was an avid sportsman. He was a husky farm boy and became a champion wrestler while attending the University of Utah. He was also a natural at fishing and hunting. Many trophies remain in his mountain cabin as reminders of his excellence in hunting and keen sense of adventure. As he matured, he became a master teacher of nature, and left a legacy of hunting and fishing stories to his posterity.

Z. Reed was a noted, eloquent orator in the eyes of both young and old and was a renowned story teller. He was delightfully witty and humorous, and had a profound influence on youth. He always had an interest in young people, and the youth were always interested in him and in his great wealth of knowledge. He is remembered as "the Abraham Lincoln of modern times" among many of his colleagues, which is an indication of his insightful speaking style.

He was an advocate of patriotism. He believed in the red, white, and blue as directed by honorable leaders with public virtue. A responsible citizen, he was always involved with the affairs of the day and constantly encouraged citizens to love their country, and to remember the high price our forefathers paid to obtain freedom. He was recognized as a public advocate of individual responsibility. He was successful not only because he was a great speaker, but because he had a deep love for mankind and was always willing to listen. Z. Reed was the first person to be featured in the Idaho Statesman as a "Distinguished Citizen" and was termed "Mr. Mormon" in the article.

Z. Reed Millar loved the study of law and practiced until he was 82 years old. In 1979, his legal work came to an abrupt end when he suffered a severe stroke, which hampered his ability to communicate. This tragedy was very difficult for him because he could no longer enjoy the life of public speaking and counseling with others. He bore his burden well to the end.

His influence has had a far-reaching effect on others through his law practice, in the Latter-day Saints Church, in the community, and on his friends and family. He was a man of high principles and integrity. His reputation was impeccable. He was a tower of strength to his family, and left a legacy of tenacity, perseverance, and steadfast commitment for his 6 children, 34 grandchildren, and 17 great grandchildren.

We will miss this great statesman and friend in Idaho.

FORUMS ON FEDERAL PENSIONS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on Civil Service, Post Office and General Services, Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, has been conducting a series of forums discussing the design of the new retirement plan for the Federal Government.

At the end of the last session the Congress passed legislation establishing an interim 2-year program for Federal employees covered by the social security system. Next year we will be considering legislation establishing a new system. During this period, among other things, we are conducting these forums to educate the Congress and the public in pension plan development. At the forums, experts from the private and public sectors present papers on topics ranging from the basic design of a company retirement plan to coordination with social security to funding a pension. The next forum is scheduled for April 17 from 1 to 5 in SD-106. The topic will be coordinating pensions with social security. Each of these sessions are recorded and published in a committee print. The print of the first forum—"Economic Security Programs"—has just been published. A copy can be obtained from the subcommittee.

ENDLESS SPENDING

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the current issue of Atlantic carries an article by James Fallows that I believe warrants the attention of my colleagues as we struggle with various schemes to reduce the burgeoning Federal deficit. Mr. Fallows makes several compelling observations that have not received sufficient emphasis in the cacophony of charges and countercharges over the disarray of the budget.

First, that despite all the much-ballyhooded cuts in domestic spending programs, both discretionary and, to a lesser extent, entitlement programs, total Federal expenditures have continued to rise, and are greater as a percentage of GNP than at any time since World War II;

Second, that the principal component of growth in the budget has been entitlement programs for the middle class, not welfare or "pork-barrel," or any of the domestic programs that have borne the brunt of the reductions; and Third, that Federal tax expenditures, that is, revenue lost to the Treasury because of various benefits and loopholes, have grown three times as fast as direct Federal expenditures since 1967. We forget that side of the ledger.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ENDLESS SPENDING

(Proposals for cutting the deficit ignore its real cause—the growing costs of providing for the middle class)

Voters will hear quite a bit this year, especially from Democrats, about the evils of large federal deficits. They will hear very little from either party about the more important economic development of which deficits are merely a sign.

At first glance, the deficit question looks like an open-and-shut political case, which favors the Democrats and works against President Reagan. Before the beginning of this Administration, deficit spending had never exceeded $67 billion in any one year. (It reached that level under Gerald Ford, in the recession year of 1976.) But in fiscal year 1984, which ends five weeks before this fall's election, the deficit is expected to be $184 billion, and most forecasting services predict that it will remain in the vicinity of $200 to $300 billion a year for as many years in the future as their projections run.

Between the end of the Second World War and the beginning of the Reagan Administration, the deficit had never represented more than 4 percent of the gross national product, its level in 1976, and in only two other years had it been as high as 3 percent. But in 1983, the deficit was 6.1 percent of the GNP. Although predictions vary, most show that deficits will average 4 or even 5 percent of the GNP through late in this decade. For thirty-five years after the end of the Second World War, the total public debt fell almost continuously, year by year, when measured as a percentage of the GNP. In 1982, it began to rise again.

Perhaps most dramatic, the "structural" deficit—the amount that would be left even after a full economic recovery, with many people paying taxes and few drawing benefits—has reached a new plateau. Through the 1970s, the decade of America's most fitful economic performance since the 1930s, the structural deficit averaged 1.9 percent a year of the GNP. During the late 1980s, if current policies are followed, it will remain stuck somewhere between 3 and 5 percent a year.

Seizing on this one obvious weakness in the President's domestic performance, the Democrats have accused him of creating the deficits through a big military buildup and an unrealistically large reduction in tax rates. The architects of the tax cut have in turn blamed the Federal Reserve Board, the Congress, and even quislings within the Administration for delaying and diluting the original tax-cut plan, thereby bringing on recession, deficits, and ruin.

In a sense, all of them are right. Any farminded etiology of today's deficits reveals that only the combined impact of tax cuts, defense increases, and recession could have made the deficits as large as they are. But in another sense, all the political accusations miss the point. If there has been a significant fact about public finance during the Reagan Administration, it is not that taxes have been reduced. It is, instead, that government spending has continued to rise.

The "supply-side" principles of economic management, which were ratified by the tax-cut legislation of 1981, have, in fact, reduced taxes, but not to a dramatic degree. In fiscal year 1980, the federal government took in 20.1 percent of the gross national product through taxes and other levies. Four years later, in fiscal year 1984, federal revenues have fallen to 18.8 percent of the GNP.

But during the same four years, federal expenditures have risen at least as substantially as tax rates have fallen. In 1980, federal outlays were 22.4 percent of the GNP. In the first budget that the President's economic advisers submitted after taking office, they predicted that by 1985 the economy would have expanded so rapidly and government spending would have shrunk so fast that federal outlays would be a mere 19 percent of the GNP, about what they were during Lyndon Johnson's Administration. In reality, by the end of this fiscal year, federal spending, according to the Congressional Budget Office, will be not 19 percent of the gross national product, as it was supposed to be, nor 22.4 percent, as it was when the President took office, but 24 percent, the highest in postwar history. Under Ronald Reagan, the federal government's claim on national output is larger than it has ever been in modern history except when federal dollars were needed to build Liberty ships and supply General Patton with tanks.

That Government expenditures should continue growing faster than the private economy, in the teeth of a conservative Administration with a reputation for slashing budgets, ought to give us something to talk about in an election year. One part of the growth might be said to reflect deliberate choice. Federal spending has risen to nearly one quarter of the GNP in part because the military budget has increased from 5.3 percent of the GNP to 6.6 percent from 1980 to 1984. But the military budget was not the only one that grew. Medicare and Social Security rose from 5.8 percent of the GNP in 1980 to 6.8 percent in 1984, and interest payments on the national debt rose from 2 percent to 2.9. All other categories of government spending shrank, but not by as much as these grew.

The absolute increase in military spending was larger than those in the other areas. But even if the share of the gross national product devoted to the military had not increased at all (remember that the Carter Administration proposed an increase about half as large as the one the Reagan Administration has achieved), government spending under Reagan would still claim a larger share of the GNP than ever before in peacetime.

Except for the military budget, the sources of increased government spending have been nowhere near center stage in this year's political arguments. Instead, each contending group—the supply-siders, the more orthodox Republican conservatives, and the Democrats—has developed an alibi for the deficits that is consistent with its short-term political interests. The supply-siders say that deficits don't matter, the other Republicans blame big spenders in Congress, and the Democrats say that both the President's tax cut and his defense budget are too large.

The unspoken theme that runs through all the groups' positions is that the growth in government spending cannot be contained. For each dollar the Democrats would take out of an MX or B-1 contract, they have already promised at least a dollar in new spending for education, job training, or other domestic programs. The Republican conservatives rail against spendthrift Democrats yet propose no significant reductions themselves. They argue by implication what the Democrats say quite plainly: that taxes must go up. The supply-siders, of course, disagree; their world is built on the idea that taxes must go down. Their options, then, were to try to reduce spending or to laugh away the deficits that resulted from higher spending and lower taxes. In undertaking the second task, they revealed their assessment that the first could not be done.

Through most of 1983, Donald Regan, the secretary of the treasury, his former assistant secretary for economic policy, Paul Craig Roberts, and Roberts's successor, Manuel Johnson, traveled the country saying, essentially, If deficits are so bad, why does the economy look so good? Interest rates have declined since 1981, when the prime rate hit 21 percent, so how can the government be "crowding out" other borrowers to meet its credit demands? Inflation barely exists, so where is the hyperstimulation that deficit spending supposedly brings? Too many people are still out of work, so can it make sense to raise any individual's—or business's—taxes? On the other hand, the economic recovery is well under way, so can the deficits really be so serious a threat to economic growth?

Much of this argument, of course, was simply a rehabilitation of John Maynard Keyes. With the government injecting so much extra money into the economy through deficit spending, an orthodox Keynesian would expect a recovery that featured more consumer spending than business investment—which is exactly what we have seen. The Keynesian would go on to warn that since the deficit spending was projected to continue even if everyone was back at work (this is the "structural deficit"), it would inevitably lead to inflation or some other economic mishap. But the supply-siders, selective in their embrace of Keynes, brushed off this point.

They also disregarded the more immediate and provable consequences of deficit spending. Today's interest rates are very high when measured in "real" terms—the difference between them and the rate of inflation. (Last year's inflation rate was about 4 percent, and the prime interest rate was 11, for a real interest rate of 7 percent, versus a historic norm of less than 2 percent.) They are also high by international standards—almost twice as high as Japan's, for example. Nearly everyone, except the supplysiders, concedes at least some connection between heavy federal borrowing and high interest rates. The rates would be even higher if it weren't for foreign investors, who have been pouring their assets into the United States to take advantage of the higher return available here. This has made the dollar much stronger relative to the mark, the yen, and the pound, which has meant good news for American tourists but disaster for American export industries. In addition to the largest budget deficit in history, 1983 produced the largest foreign-trade deficit, $69 billion. The President's U.S. trade representative, William Brock, has predicted that this year's will reach $100 billion. American exports fell by nearly one sixth from 1981 to 1983; the Commerce Department has estimated that this decline eliminated 1.3 million American jobs.

Rudolph Penner, the director of the Congressional Budget Office, spent most of last fall and winter warning that budget deficits, like other sums subject to the workings of compound interest, can have surprisingly large cumulative effects. The ripples from this year's near-$200 billion deficit will not cease in Ronald Reagan's lifetime, nor in his baby granddaughter's. The Administration projects that annual interest payments will be $47.4 billion higher in 1985 than when it took office. That increase more than wipes out all the reductions made in social-welfare programs when Ronald Reagan and David Stockman held Congress in meek submission in 1981. Because of this year's deficit, next year's interest burden will be roughly $20 billion greater than this year's (or more, if the interest rates rise). That is, the government will have $20 billion less to work with next year and every succeeding year than if there had been no deficit this year. With that money, it could have paid nearly all the costs of the Medicaid program, or more than tripled its annual grants for elementary, secondary, and vocational education, or more than doubled all benefits under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children and Food Stamps programs, or placed forty Border Patrol agents where each one stands now, or increased the Internal Revenue Service's auditing staff by 600 percent, or increased foreign aid by 400 percent. To put it another way, in order to make up for the lost $20 billion, it could cancel orders for a thousand new fighter planes or for two complete nuclear-powered aircraft-carrier battle groups, or give up the entire MX missile system, or cancel construction of ten Trident submarines—and ten more the following year, when there will be another $20 billion loss to cover.

Secretary Regan has not seriously attempted to rebut the export argument or Penner's analysis, because he and his supply-side associates are not really talking about the deficit at all. They are talking about taxes. Their creed is based on the belief that steadily higher tax rates accounted for much of the recent stagnation of the American economy; they are determined that the rates shall not go back up. They know that, because payroll taxes for Social Security and Medicare have steadily risen, many Americans are now subject to higher overall tax rates than they were before Ronald Reagan "cut" taxes. In 1960, a typical family earning the national median income paid 10.1 percent of its total income in federal income and Social Security taxes. Because of the bracket structure of the progressive income tax, the next dollar the family earned would be taxed at a "marginal" rate of 20 percent. In 1980, its overall federal taxes had risen to 17.5 percent of its income and the marginal rate was 30 percent. In 1984, taxes on a median-income family are still at about their 1980 level, the Social Security increases and income-tax decreases having canceled each other out. But tax rates for those who earn less than the median income are already higher than before Reagan took office, and rates for every income category are scheduled to rise in order to pay for Social Security.

When speaking for the record, the supply-siders often said that they preferred "to hold the line on taxes to force a confrontation with the Congress over spending cuts," as Manuel Johnson put it in an interview late last year. But they said very little about where the cuts would be made; in fact, their arguments revealed their conclusion that it was futile even to think about controlling spending. They found themselves apologizing for deficits because the only alternative was the thing they most feared—a "revenue solution."

For non-supply-siders and for nearly all the Democrats, the "revenue solution"—higher taxes—was the inevitable remedy. With varying degrees of honesty, the Democratic candidates have said they would attack big deficits with tax increases. John Glenn, the most forthright on this point, proposed an across-the-board 10 percent surcharge on taxes, so that a company or individual now in the 50 percent tax bracket would pay 55, while the rate for those in the bottom 11 percent bracket would rise only to 12.1. Most of the Democrats, including Glenn and Walter Mondale, said that they would eliminate or postpone the plan to index tax brackets to inflation; in addition, Mondale proposed a 10 percent surtax for people earning more than $100,000, a 15 percent minimum tax on corporate income, and other steps to raise taxes at the upper reaches of the income distribution. Together with a hazily defined program of reducing defense and medical spending, these taxes would, according to Mondale, cut the deficit in half within four years.

Inside the administration, a crucial and well-publicized battle was waged this winter over whether to include any "revenue solutions" in the 1985 budget, which was submitted in February, or to put the whole thing off until after the election. Through December and January, White House officials on both sides of the struggle hinted in interviews that a revenue solution might be at hand. Edwin Dale, David Stockman's spokesman at the Office of Management and Budget, said, "If we don't face this [the deficits] in 1984, I don't know how we can deal with it in 1985." An economic adviser in the White House ended a thirty-minute soliloquy about the dangers of chronic deficits by saying, "I think the President should announce a tax increase, run on it—and then get a mandate for doing something next year." Yet when the budget came out, it contained no "revenue solution," nor any but trivial reductions in spending.

If he is re-elected, presumably the President will be less coy. His assistants say they cannot be sure whether the means will be an overt tax increase or a retreat from indexing or a new excise tax or some sweeping plan for tax reform, but in one way or another, they say, a second Reagan Administration will be forced to bring more money into the Treasury. Manuel Johnson said, "Against my wishes, it looks like we're moving toward a big tax increase." It will probably not be quite as big an increase as if the Democrats win, which means that the economic choice to be made in this election is one of degree. If Ronald Reagan is re-elected, deficit spending will be relatively more important as a way of meeting federal obligations. If the Democrats win, they will rely more on taxes. The obligations themselves will differ in composition—more military spending from the Republicans, more domestic initiatives from the Democrats—but not much in size.

"History will record that the first Reagan Administration stopped the juggernaut of federal spending," an official of the OMB said last winter. "It will also record that he demonstrated the floor beneath which government spending as a share of GNP cannot be driven." Manuel Johnson said, "Some people feel that this is the level of service that the public wants, and we've got to find a way to pay for it."

Indeed, the behavior of both parties indicates that we have come to an historic accord on the dimensions of the modern welfare/national-security state. Through AFDC, Food Stamps, and Medicaid—which together cost roughly $40 billion, or less than one fourth as much as Social Security—it will make modest provisions for a dependent class. Through Social Security and Medicare, it will provide a cushion for the retired. Above all, it will continue to grow.

It will grow because all of its most important components contain built-in expansive pressures. Military spending, interest payments, and Social Security and Medicare together account for more than two thirds of all federal outlays, and each of them is increasing. When the other entitlement programs, the largest of which are military and civil-service pensions, are included, these categories account for more than four fifths of the federal budget—or more money than the government collects in taxes. If we awoke to find that the federal government had abandoned every function except paying pensions and medical bills, fielding a military, and meeting the interest on its debt, we would still find that the budget was in deficit, and that the deficit was on its way up.

Most of the Democratic candidates say that they would start wrestling with the deficit by canceling the B-1 bomber or the MX missile, but their proposed reductions in defense spending are merely reductions in the rate of increase. Even if he wanted to, the next President would find it difficult to brake military spending before the end of his term. The major purchases—the aircraft carriers, the bomber fleets—are already locked in by votes taken in 1982. A Democratic President might push the military onto a much lower "growth path" in the long run, but for the next few years defense spending seems certain to grow, no matter which party is in office.

So do Social Security, Medicare, and the other public pension programs, all subject to the demands of an aging population. Medicare, moreover, is affected not only by a growing number of clients but also by the sharply rising costs of medical procedures. According to Medicare trustees, the most expensive part of the system, Hospital Insurance, which covers hospital bills for aged patients, will run out of money sometime between 1988 and 1990. Hospital Insurance is legally forbidden to run a deficit, so the program will have to be "saved"; but unless the incentives in the medical system are changed, the result will boil down to raising taxes.

Hospital Insurance is now financed by a payroll tax of 2.7 percent. (It is part of the payroll deduction that most people think of as Social Security. The deduction totals 14.1 percent of a company's payroll costs, divided between employee and employer.) Under the trustees' optimistic set of economic assumptions, the tax necessary to pay for Hospital Insurance will nearly double, to 4.9 percent of the payroll, by the year 2005. If medical costs rise more quickly than expected, or if the taxable payroll rises more slowly, the trustees say the tax may reach 8 percent. The rest of the payroll tax will be rising too, because of steps taken to "save" Social Security in 1977 and again five years later. Technically speaking, Social Security and Hospital Insurance cannot add to the federal deficit, since they are required to cover their own costs through payroll taxes. But from the employee's point of view, there is not a lot of difference between the deduction listed in the FICA tax column and that under Federal Tax Withheld. Whatever the category, the money is still missing from the paycheck. So, as payroll taxes go up, it becomes harder to raise the income tax to pay for other federal obligations.

The costs of other pension programs are headed the same way. Civil-service retirement now costs roughly $22 billion a year, compared with $8 billion eight years ago.

Military pensions have similarly increased. Every actuary will say privately what the Grace Commission reported publicly last January: that the federal pension programs are more generous than any others ever devised. Under the typical private system, the retirement age is sixty-three or sixty-four, the pension is some percentage of the highest five years' pay, and benefits are not indexed for inflation. The federal plans typically offer retirement at age fifty-five (civil service) or forty (military), base their benefits on the highest three years' pay, and are fully indexed for inflation. No national-security argument can be made for granting pensions after twenty years' military service. Indeed, many scholars of the military say that longer careers, typical of European armies, would improve the character of military leadership, by reducing the pressures of today's up-or-out promotion system.

Yet, in the chorus of reaction to the Grace Commission's report, neither Democrat nor Republican was heard supporting changes in public pension plans. (The exception was Ernest Hollings, who proposed a freeze on federal pensions as part of a freeze on most government spending. His lowly standing in the presidential race, however, proves the larger point.) In the briefings that accompanied its 1985 budget, the Reagan Administration hinted that it would wrestle with pensions and medical programs—but not until next year, after the election. Its failure to face them so far is more impressive than its assurances about the future.

And, of course, interest payments must grow; their meteoric increase is a measure of the inability to square accounts elsewhere in the budget. Since the Second World War, they have averaged between 8 and 10 percent of all federal spending. The House Budget Committee has extrapolated from current policies to predict that by the end of this decade they will account for 16 percent of the budget, or $200 billion per year. As "an ever-increasing share of taxes is devoted to paying the interest on past borrowing, the pressures will be great to repudiate the debt in some way," the committee said in its report. "Historically, this has taken the form, in many countries, of rapidly printing money to reduce the real value of the burdensome public debt through high inflation. . . . In this sense, our own deficits are truly mortgaging our grandchildren's futures to allow us to enjoy higher consumption today."

Have we reached the historic consensus? Has our politics evolved to a point where Democrats and Republicans will fight over raising taxes versus tolerating deficits, but have little to say about an entitlement system that confers benefits on more and more of us regardless of need? So it seems; and if that appearance is correct, each party will have to accept a consequence that it claims to abhor.

Republicans must accept that, year after year, a larger share of national income will be claimed by taxes. If they believe anything their President and his economic theorists have been saying about the connection between individual incentive and economic growth, they must view such a future with dread. If they are resigned to the dimensions of the modern welfare/national-security state, they must scrap their deepest convictions about the ways a nation generates its wealth.

For Democrats, the intellectual and spiritual cost may be even higher. The more they foster a government that sluices benefits to everyone, the less room they will have for visions of a redistributive state. Social Security and Medicare protect vulnerable people from catastrophe, which is one important kind of redistribution. But they are not redistributive in the normal sense. They are financed by a payroll tax, which weighs especially heavily on small businesses and those in low income brackets, and they generally provide the largest benefits to those who were most comfortable to begin with. Despite Social Security's growth, many of its beneficiaries need more. The only real redistribution Social Security affects is from one generation to another: those now under the age of forty or forty-five are transferring resources to their elders. Perhaps this is justified. The generation that won the Second World War and built the postwar prosperity is receiving tribute from its children. But this is not the kind of goal Democrats usually pledge themselves to, and it is so expensive that it precludes redistribution of any other kind.

The tax system, too, bears the marks of both parties' desire to provide benefits for everyone. "Tax expenditures" is the government's term for revenue that is lost because certain kinds of income—say, interest on municipal bonds—is declared nontaxable. Tax expenditures have risen even faster than direct federal expenditures have. In 1983, they cost the government almost three times as much money as in 1967, after adjusting for inflation. Democrats like to point out that many of the provisions shelter business income. Ernest Hollings, with the honesty that often betokens a floundering campaign, listed four of them that he would eliminate (tax-free status for interest on life-insurance reserves, which he said would bring in $30.8 billion in additional taxes over five years; allowances for intangible drilling costs for oil and gas, $19.3 billion; the famous oil-depletion allowance, $8.7 billion; excess-bad-debt allowances for banks, $4.2 billion). Hollings pointed out that Texaco had earned $2 billion in profits worldwide in 1982, yet had received an $88 million refund from the federal government. Corporations, he said, should also face a minimum 4 percent income tax.

But not even Hollings, of all the candidates the most honorably explicit on budgetary questions, dared talk about another kind of tax-free haven. Perhaps the candidates recalled Jimmy Carter's experience in the 1976 campaign, when he briefly mentioned limiting the tax deduction for mortgage-interest payments and was pummeled from all sides for having made an unpardonable gaffe. The mortgage-interest deduction is sacred to the middle class, yet of the $28 billion in taxes that it diverts from the Treasury this year, half would have been paid by the wealthiest 10 percent of households. (One quarter of the total savings go to the wealthiest 2 percent of households.) The property-tax deduction, the tax-free status of medical-insurance benefits, and other "middle-class" tax breaks vary in detail, but their overall effect is the same. Only about a third of all households, the most affluent ones, itemize deductions at all, which means that the other two thirds get absolutely no benefits from most of these deductions. If both parties refuse to confront the exemptions—even a change as modest as limiting mortgage deductions to one house per family or to a certain amount of interest paid per year—where will they find the money for the next increase in benefits?

This is not merely a matter of patches of red ink in a ledger book: if we cannot control the budget, we must face unpleasant questions about the central purpose of our government. Only nine years ago, although it must seem like prehistory to him, David Stockman prophesied eloquently about the government's failure to confine its generosity to the intended recipients. If transfer spending were ever to be contained, he said, it would have to serve some explicit purpose—whether that purpose was the limited one of saving "the truly needy" from starvation or a more ambitious one of income redistribution. Yet neither party, he said, seemed able to discipline benefits. For example, educational loans, meant to offer opportunity to those who would otherwise be denied it, were soon extended to everyone, including future doctors, whose rise to the top of the income distribution scale was thus subsidized by their fellow citizens.

Viewed cynically, the growth of federal spending is no mystery at all: the more the government evolves into a benefit program for the middle and upper-middle classes, the larger it must become. Every Democratic politician has pointed out that the supply-side tax cuts conferred the greatest reward on the richest people. But at least supply-siders had a rationale, however dubious, for distributing benefits as they did. By returning money to the wealthy, they believed, they could revitalize the economy. What is the rationale for pensioning off soldiers at age forty, or subsidizing the purchase of very expensive homes, or raising payroll taxes so as to guarantee Social Security benefits to everyone, including those who could not conceivably be called needy? Why should the government subsidize the small number of people who can afford private jet planes? (The tax levied on jet fuel does not come close to paying for the runways, control towers, and other equipment and services that the government provides either free or at a discount.) There is everything to be said for private jets and comfortable retirements and costly homes. But why should the government underwrite the cost?

Most politicians obviously feel that it is impossible even to raise such questions. By evading them, our elected leaders make the entire financial structure dangerously brittle. What if all those foreign investors whose capital now covers our budget deficits suddenly take their money back home? What if another recession begins, and we confront a deficit not of $200 billion but of $400 billion? What if the government decides that it can escape its mounting debts only by starting up the printing presses? Are the potential wounds less grievous because they would be self-inflicted?—James Fallows.

UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH CAROLINA COLLEGE OF NURSING SILVER ANNIVERSARY

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I rise today to proudly recognize the College of Nursing at the University of South Carolina as it celebrates the silver anniversary of its baccalaureate progam. While observance of its 25th anniversary has occurred throughout the academic year 1983–84, appropriately, the celebration will culminate at the 1984 Viana McCown lectureship on April 13. Miss McCown was the first professor of nursing when the department was established, and it was she who, for many years, actively supported the philosophical base for a 4-year program.

The College of Nursing at the University of South Carolina began in 1958, when 37 students were admitted to the new collegiate program offering the bachelor of science in nursing degree. The original school was housed in the historic McCutchen House on the USC-Columbia campus. Built in 1813, the McCutchen House had served as a faculty-student residence as well as for the confinement of wounded soldiers during the Civil War.

Four years after the first students entered the College of Nursing at USC, 22 students graduated. The graduation of this first class of students established the program's eligibility for accreditation which was granted by the National League for Nursing in December 1962. Additional growth during the 1960's was marked by the establishment of an endowment by Miss Viana McCown to provide an annual lecture by an outstanding nursing leader and by the establishment of the community nursing fund by Emily Myrtle Smith at the time of her retirement from the U.S. Public Health Service. Also initiated in the 1960's to recognize the outstanding performance of nursing students was the Alpha XI Chapter of Sigma Theta Tau, the national honorary society in nursing.

The decade of the seventies brought two major changes to the school of nursing. The title of the school was changed to College of Nursing by the University of South Carolina Board of Trustees in October 1970. And, in 1974, the college of nursing moved to a magnificent new building—the Williams-Brice Nursing Building. Funds from the estate of Mrs. Martha W. Brice, Federal moneys which I am pleased to have obtained, and state capital improvement bonds made the six-story nursing building possible. November 1984 will mark the 10th anniversary of the move which brought all nursing programs under one roof for the first time in the college's history.

Continuing their successful nursing education programs, the college of nursing enjoyed still further growth during the 1970's. The undergraduate curriculum grew and a master of nursing degree was added with admission of the first class in fall 1971. At first, two majors were offered—administration in nursing and psychiatric-community mental health nursing. With the 1974 academic year came two additional graduate programs—the health nursing major and the clinical nursing major. Accreditation for the master's program was granted in May 1977.

The College of Nursing at the University of South Carolina continues to build on the foundation of the past two decades. This relatively young program has grown to become the 12th largest school of nursing in the United States, employing over 70 faculty to teach 950 students. As a strong leader in Southeastern nursing education, the College of Nursing offers academic courses to registered nurses during the evenings and weekends using a variety of teaching modalities including statewide television.

The rapid advances in medicine and the changing nature of health care has greatly accelerated the demand for registered nurses. The intensity of care has increased with more RN's needed to carry out such activities as monitoring vital functions, ventilation therapy with infusion pumps, and the application of many new technologies. The College of Nursing at USC has responded to meet these changing needs and I take deep pride in pointing out that the baccalaureate program was recently ranked in the top 4 percent of nursing programs in the Nation by the Gourman Reports. The master's program continues to expand and now enrolls 140 students. In addition to this growth, nursing research efforts have grown steadily in the last 3 years as the faculty continues to contribute to the knowledge base for professional nursing practice.

Let me close by saying that there is no doubt in this Senator's mind that the Nation's professional nurses are the backbone of our health care system. These unselfish and caring individuals are in daily contact with patients; comforting them in pain and supporting families in times of stress. Whether they work in health centers, public health clinics, physicians' offices, schools, industry, or public administration, we in South Carolina are most proud of the record of achievement of the College of Nursing at the University of South Carolina in training these outstanding professionals. South Carolina and the Nation have been well served through the efforts of the 3,300 graduates of the nursing programs at USC and we look forward to many, many more to come.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL FOR FISCAL YEAR 1984 PUBLIC LAW 480 PROGRAM

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will resume consideration of the unfinished business, which the clerk will state.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A House joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, to the Department of Agriculture.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

AMENDMENT NO. 2886, AS MODIFIED

(Purpose: To restrict availability of funds for El Salvador)

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, what is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I want first of all to say to my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) and any others who may be listening that this amendment was really the creation of our distinguished colleague from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE). If you look through the bill, you will find this language, almost the precise language, is also in the bill as it pertains to Panama. I do not want to belabor this, Mr. President, because I certainly hope the floor managers will be willing to accept the amendment, but it is crafted from the idea of Senator INOUYE. That simply says, as I have transposed it to affect El Salvador, that should the duly elected President of El Salvador be prevented from taking office or be deposed once having taken office by military decree or military force, then the funds not theretofore disbursed under this appropriation will immediately be withheld until Congress reappropriates it.

At this point, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to modify the last line of my amendment so that it reads on line 6, "for obligation or expenditure unless reappropriated by Congress," striking the words "appropriated again."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is so modified.

(The amendment, as modified, is as follows:)

At the appropriate place in the bill, add the following new section:

"SEC. —. If at any time following the appropriation of funds herein the duly elected President of El Salvador should be prevented from taking office by military force or military decree or after taking office shall be deposed by military force or military decree, all funds appropriated herein for El Salvador and not theretofore obligated or expended shall not thereafter be available for obligation or expenditure unless reappropriated by Congress."

Mr. BUMPERS. So, Mr. President, we have a commitment in El Salvador to the building and the nurturing of democratic institutions—free elections and, hopefully, the popular support of a duly elected government by the population. The only way the guerrillas in El Salvador will be ultimately defeated is if the government in El Salvador is a just one, if human rights are complied with, if economic progress is made, and if the people of El Salvador prefer that government to the one the guerrillas are trying to impose on them.

But we should not ask to have it both ways. We cannot say that we will support government by force on our side because it is good and resist government by force on the other side. That is not our national character and that is not what our policy—I am not at all sure what our policy is in El Salvador, frankly, but certainly, a part of our policy there is to install democratic institutions and to prove to the people not only of El Salvador but throughout Central America that our system of government in the long run is better than communism.

Mr. President, I might also say—and this is repeating what I said last evening—that I hope Napoleon Duarte is elected President. But we have fostered these elections. We have heard Senators on the floor. My distinguished colleague from Oklahoma (Mr. BOREN) spoke in the Democratic caucus last week with great fervor and great feeling about how he felt being witness to the elections in El Salvador. It was most poignant to listen to him talking about how the people were voting in such overwhelming numbers—not because they understand democracy all that much. El Salvador has a very checkered history of one military coup after another. What he said was those people want to express themselves in a way that they think will stop the shooting and the violence and the killing of innocent men and women and children for a cause which they do not understand. I think we ought to champion that, I think we ought to nurture it, and I think this amendment goes a long way.

This is certainly not intended to put this administration into a box or to be a slap of any kind at the President. It is simply to put in this bill a codification of what our policy is in El Salvador.

With that, Mr. President, I sincerely hope the floor managers will see fit to accept this amendment.

Incidentally, Mr. President, if I may, I ask unanimous consent that Senator PRYOR be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, first, I should like to yield to the Senator from Hawaii whatever time he may desire.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I wish to speak in support of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

This amendment states very clearly and directly that the United States will not continue to support the armed forces of El Salvador if the military intervenes in the forthcoming election or refuses to accept the outcome of that election. The amendment is a strong statement in support of U.S. policies and objectives in that country where, I remind the Senate, the United States is expending vast sums of money to encourage the democratic process.

Mr. President, I believe that the minimum that we should expect in return for our military assistance is political neutrality on the part of the armed forces of El Salvador. If our assistance is being provided to help the armed forces of El Salvador protect the infant democratic process, if this is how we justify the provision of weapons and ammunition, then surely we can and must insist on military neutrality. If we do not, all of our solemn declarations in support of freedom—all of our speeches warning of the threat to democracy posed by Marxist insurgents—will have a hollow and empty sound. If we are to mean what we say, we must do what we say. If we are to be true to ourselves, to the principles of this Nation, and to the American people, we can do no other than to demand that our efforts support democracy.

(By unanimous consent the names of Mr. CHAFEE and Mr. BOREN were added as cosponsors of the amendment (No. 2886), as modified.)

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I have had a chance to examine the Senator's amendment. As I said to the Senator last evening, I believe the amendment is a good one, one that we ought to support. I also believe, Mr. President, that, as the Senator from Arkansas said, this language is, for all practical purposes, exactly the same as the language which the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) put in the bill in the committee and was adopted on a voice vote.

I simply wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas, the author of the amendment, if he agrees with me that his purpose in offering this amendment is a further sign of U.S. support for the democratic process in El Salvador and is not meant to be a slap in any way at the Salvadoran military.

Mr. BUMPERS. To the Senator from Wisconsin, I simply say he is absolutely right. I think it is a very meritorious amendment, as I say, one which simply codifies what we have been saying our purpose is in El Salvador. It is not intended to hamstring the President, it is not intended to be embarrassing or denigrating to our policy there. As a matter of fact, it is a manifestation, a codification of our policy. It is offered in the utmost good faith to do what I think the American people would applaud.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Senator for his response.

Mr. President, I suggest that we yield back our time on the amendment. I am prepared on behalf of the committee to accept this amendment.

Mr. BUMPERS. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KASTEN. I yield back all my time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment (No. 2886), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUMPERS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, it is my understanding the Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) has a colloquy or would like to propose an amendment. I do not see the Senator.

I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent the time be taken from the bill equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am really distressed that nothing is going on. That is not, I think, the best circumstance, given the fact that the leadership this morning warned that we are going to be in late tonight and going to be in on Saturday if necessary to finish this bill, and this is an extravagant use of our time.

It is 1 p.m. I understand it may be 2 p.m. before we can get anything going. I hope that is not so.

But, Mr. President, I reiterate what I said before. We are going to try to finish this bill this week. Now, it is possible that Members can prevent that. There is no final limitation of time on the passage of this bill. But I wish Senators to know that the leadership on this side is absolutely serious that we are going to drive to finish this bill this week and Senators should be on notice that we will be in late tonight and we will be in late tomorrow night, if necessary, and the night after that, and we will be in on Saturday if that is required to finish this bill.

That is not an idle statement. It is a fact, and I am really distressed to find when I come to the Chamber that I am advised by the managers that we do not have anything that we can call us now and it is going to be 2 p.m.

before we can get to one of the significant amendments. I really regret that.

And I hope that Senators may listen to this and come to the Chamber and try to help us get on with this measure because otherwise we are going to be here for a long, long time.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. KASTEN. I wish to say to the majority leader that I share his concern, and frankly I do not understand why after 2 or 3 days in which we have been working hard trying to accommodate Members in terms of ordering amendments, grouping amendments, et cetera, and the latest was earlier this morning when we came in order to accommodate the Senator from Arkansas and accept that amendment.

We now are waiting for one more amendment, and that is an amendment of the Senator from Vermont, the Senator from Delaware, and others, relating to the War Powers Act.

It is likely that the amendment will not even relate to the Appropriations Committee or this emergency appropriations bill. The fact is, I think, that we should be debating this amendment. I am hopeful that we can then move forward and take care of the other amendments on Nicaragua and other subjects.

But I simply wish to point out to the majority leader that we have been here since the Senate came into session this morning, and the only thing we have been able to do is the one amendment, not because we are not anxious to deal with these amendments, but because the authors of the amendments have been unwilling to bring them forward.

I hope that we do not waste this whole hour, and I hope that Senators do not feel that by not bringing up their amendments, they are somehow going to defeat the overall progress on the bill. By not bringing their amendments, what they are doing, it seems to me, is just inconveniencing all Members of the Senate. Whether it is tonight, tomorrow night, or the next night, we will finish this bill, because it seems we have developed a bipartisan consensus to go forward not only with the aid to El Salvador but with the overall bill.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator and I agree with him.

Let me say that it really does distress me when I have Members say that they do not wish to bring up their amendments.

That is not the way the leadership on this side has approached this bill. We entered into a time agreement that provided 40 hours approximately for debate on amendments and then no time limitation on the bill. That may have been a mistake, Mr. President, because by doing that we guaranteed that those amendments would have an opportunity to be offered and there would not be a tabling motion at least until the time had expired.

The leadership on this side gave up a substantial advantage by agreeing to that proposal.

But, Mr. President, then in the wake of that to have Senators say it is not convenient to offer their amendments now is really, it seems to me, not in keeping with the original arrangement on how we were going to proceed.

Mr. President, I do not mean to sound angry, and I am not angry, but I am disappointed that we cannot get on with the bill at hand.

I urge Senators to come to the Chamber and offer their amendments and get on with it.

The idea of wasting an hour or so in the middle of the day when we are engaged in a major debate is, in my view, at least unconscionable.

Mr. President, it is with great reluctance, but having no other alternative, that I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAFEE). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am advised that there was unanimous consent that the time consumed in the previous quorum would be charged against the joint resolution.

Mr. President, I renew the request for the arrangement for the charge of the time with the quorum I am about to suggest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time will be charged equally.

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Now, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KASTEN. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEVIN. Madam President, I had intended to offer an amendment tightening the link between human rights progress in El Salvador and continued military aid. Time for this amendment was included in the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are considering this appropriation bill.

I am concerned that the current language in this bill requires the President to only file one report of demonstrated progress in achieving the human rights goals set forth by the Kissinger Commission in order for the funds in the bill to be made available to the Government of El Salvador. Apparently, this report would be made shortly after enactment and would start the flow of funds. This legislation provides for subsequent reports at 60-day intervals "on the progress made" in achieving the goals of the Kissinger Commission, but does not make continued military assistance contingent upon actual showings in these reports of demonstrated progress in achieving human rights.

I believe that it is important that the Senate reaffirm the principle that continued military assistance should be contingent upon periodic reports demonstrating progress in human rights. I have been in communication with Prof. Carlos Diaz-Alejandro, who was a member of the Kissinger Commission, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of his letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY IN THE CITY OF NEW YORK,
New York, N.Y., March 28, 1984.

Senator CARL LEVIN,
Russell Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR LEVIN: I am happy to answer the clarifying question posed by your staff.

The "conditionality clause" in page 104 of the Report of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America clearly implies, in my judgement, that disbursement of aid to El Salvador should be made contingent on reports showing significant progress toward the termination of the activities of the so-called death squads, as well as the other goals listed in that paragraph.

If the reports show no significant progress, then aid disbursements should be suspended.

Sincerely,

CARLOS DIAZ-ALEJANDRO,
Professor of Economics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator about to offer an amendment? If not, someone will have to yield time.

Mr. KASTEN. Madam President, I yield the Senator such time as he desires on the joint resolution.

Mr. LEVIN. Madam President, this letter says, in part, "If the reports show no significant progress, then aid disbursements should be suspended." I believe that if we break the link between continued military assistance and demonstrated progress, then we are giving up significant leverage in inducing the Government of El Salvador to improve its human rights efforts.

At the same time, however, I am aware of the committee's concern that requiring reports to show demonstrated progress every 60 days may be an impractical requirement. I am also aware that one of the considerations which went into the committee's decision to require only one report in this bill linking continued military assistance to human rights progress was that this legislation will only be in effect until the end of this fiscal year—less than a 6-month period.

It is my understanding that the committee felt that requiring only one report over the 6-month period would be consistent with the earlier requirements that the President certify progress toward human rights every 6 months, and would be consistent with the Kissinger Commission intent on periodic reports.

I would ask the floor manager if he would support and work for, either as part of a foreign aid authorization or as part of an appropriation for fiscal year 1985 covering El Salvador, a requirement that continued military assistance be contingent upon 6-month reports showing demonstrated progress toward achieving the human rights goals set forth in the Kissinger Commission report?

Mr. KASTEN. Madam President, before I respond to the Senator, it is my understanding that he will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the unnumbered Levin amendment on which there is a time limit of 30 minutes, to be divided equally.

Mr. LEVIN. The Senator is correct. I have two amendments. The one I would not offer, following this colloquy and the response of my friend from Wisconsin, is my amendment relating to El Salvador and the Kissinger Commission.

Mr. KASTEN. Madam President, I can assure the Senator that it would be my intent to push for and support as part of the fiscal year 1985 appropriation or authorization for El Salvador a requirement that continued military assistance be linked to such reports demonstrating progress at 6-month periodic intervals.

I say, further, that it is our intention that the efforts that we work toward be consistent with the Kissinger Commission.

Mr. LEVIN. I thank my friend. I will not offer the amendment which we have identified as the unprinted Levin amendment relative to El Salvador.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Levin amendment relating to El Salvador, with a 30-minute time limit equally divided, be withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Senator from Michigan.

Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, we have debated over this past week military aid to the armed forces of El Salvador, but we have been focusing on only one of the U.S. assistance programs that has been used to support this administration's policy in El Salvador. That policy, no matter how you dress it up in the trappings of elections and democracy, is a military policy: Its aim is to defeat the Salvadoran rebels. It is this misguided policy aimed solely at a military solution that has kept us from seeking a cease-fire and negotiated settlement to the civil war in El Salvador; it is this misguided policy that has kept us from putting real pressure on the murderers, the corrupt, and the antidemocratic elements in the Salvadoran Army and security forces, and force their removal from power.

The point I rise to make, is one that has been obscured by this administration: All of the assistance programs between the United States and El Salvador have been dedicated to this military policy, not just the assistance programs covered under the title of "military aid."

First, let us look at the figures:

I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD with my remarks a two-page memorandum titled "U.S. Aid to El Salvador," prepared by the staff of the Arms Control and Foreign Policy Caucus, to which I shall refer in this discussion of aid figures.

In the 4 years from fiscal year 1981 through fiscal year 1984, slightly over $1 billion in U.S. aid was sent to El Salvador. This is an average of $250 per citizen in a country in which the annual average income is only $650. There have been five main categories for our aid transfers and, as the administration is always quick to point out, the largest category is not "military aid." The largest category is known as "cash transfers," with nearly $400 million being provided directly to the Government of El Salvador's Central Bank. Then comes "military aid," with over $260 million. "Economic aid," consisting of development assistance projects and economic support funds not used on cash transfers, is the third largest category, with over $210 million; and the smallest two categories are "food for sale" under the title I program, nearly $125 million, and "food, humanitarian," with nearly $30 million. I am not including in this tabulation over $100 million in commercial credits provided by our Commodity Credit Corporation and Housing Investment Guarantee program.

Now, what does it mean, that the largest category of aid is not "military aid," but rather is "cash transfers"? What does it mean, that the category titled "military aid" is outnumbered 3 to 1 by the total amounts of the other four categories of aid to El Salvador?

The administration would have us believe that our policy in El Salvador is not a military policy; after all, they say, most of our aid is not military aid. What I hope to demonstrate is that the administration cannot hide behind this facade of misleading numbers: Our entire aid program in El Salvador, all $1 billion of it in the past 4 years, and all of the nearly $1 billion that has been requested for the next 15 months, is directed toward a military solution to the civil war there. Each category of aid is used in the military effort. We are sticking our heads in the sand if we think otherwise.

Let us start with the "cash transfer" category. Nearly $400 million in direct cash infusions into El Salvador's foreign exchange. Do Senators know what the Salvadoran Government does with that money, with those dollars? It sells them! Under a special arrangement with the U.S. Government, the Salvadoran Government sells these dollars to Salvadoran importers for the local currency, colones. The importers then use the dollars to import goods, and every year our cash transfers cover the Salvadoran balance of payments deficit. Let us be perfectly clear about this point: Without that cash transfer, the Salvadoran Government could not sustain its present military policy.

And Madam President, do you know what becomes of the colones that the Salvadoran Government raises by selling the dollars to importers? Again, under a special arrangement with the U.S. Government, the Salvadoran Government puts them directly into its budget. This is El Salvador's federal budget we are talking about now. Like us, El Salvador has a deficit. Unlike us, El Salvador covers its deficit with its aid from the United States—and more.

Over 30 percent of the Salvadoran budget come from the colones raised by the cash transfers; and nearly 40 percent of the Salvadoran budget is spent directly on the army, with much of the remainder spent on indirect support.

Let us be perfectly clear about this point: Without the colones raised by the cash transfers; and nearly 40 percent of the Salvadoran budget is spent directly on the army, with much of the remainder spent on indirect support.

Let us be perfectly clear about this point: Without the colones raised by the cash transfer, the Salvadoran Government could not sustain its army and its present policy of attempting to defeat, rather than settle with, the opposition. Do we really think that this "nonmilitary" aid has no military purpose?

The cash transfer is the lifeblood of the Salvadoran military policy. It may never go directly from the U.S. taxpayer to buy a weapon, or pay a soldier, but these dollars pay the Salvadoran Government's bills in general, and allow it to continue its policy.

In a country like El Salvador, where there is no rule of law, where thousands of murders go unpunished, and usually uninvestigated, it is not surprising that this massive cash transfer program has been accomplished by criminal activity that the Salvadoran Government is powerless to stop. Funds are being siphoned out of the cash transfer program by corrupt Salvadoran businesses. I shall ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the New York Times detailing this problem, an article that discloses that a classified report done for the Agency for International Development found that after 2½ years of efforts on the part of the U.S. Government to solve the problem, it remains a serious one. This article, titled "Salvador is Faulted on Diversion of Aid in Auditor's Report", shows that the black market and corruption in the Central Bank of El Salvador are beyond the control of the authorities. Again, in a country that cannot catch murderers, the inability to catch embezzlers does not surprise me.

Turning to the "economic aid" category, there are a number of projects being managed by the Agency for International Development in El Salvador that deliver needed humanitarian assistance and employment to Salvadorans, but there are also a number of projects that are intertwined with the military policy of the United States and Salvadoran Government. I am a strong supporter of development aid, and of land reform efforts in countries where the few have prospered too long at the expense of the many. But in El Salvador, economic aid is being used to support a land reform project that is an integral part of "Operation Well-Being," a military operation in San Vincente Province that sweeps areas of rebels and suspected sympathizers and provides land and services to the peasants who remain. I am also a strong supporter of helping developing countries build the infrastructure they need to help peasants grow crops, get to market, and generally communicate with the rest of the country. But in El Salvador, economic aid is being used to rebuild roads and power lines that have been targeted in the war. Does anyone think that these projects financed by "economic aid" do not have a military purpose?

Finally, let us look at the food aid programs in El Salvador. Food aid is among the most humanitarian of our foreign aid programs. I have been a strong and consistent supporter of these programs. In El Salvador, though, I think that it is clear that the $125 million in "food for sale" and $30 million in the "food, humanitarian" categories also have had military purposes. The larger of the two categories, corresponding to title I of the food-for-peace program, relieves pressure on El Salvador's international and domestic budgets just as surely as cash transfers do: the Salvadoran Government saves dollars by getting the food as aid, and raises colones by selling the food in the country. The smaller category, corresponding to title II of the food-for-peace program, is usually completely humanitarian, and distributed to needy people in refugee camps. In El Salvador, though, there are disturbing reports from field workers that the army is withholding the food from some areas to force people to leave them. Equally disturbing reports reveal that this type of food aid is sometimes cut off to force refugees back into conflict zones. In both cases, there can be no doubt that the food aid is being used to further a military strategy. I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD of my remarks an article from the Christian Science Monitor titled "U.S. Food for Displaced Salvadorans Diverted by Corruption and Bad Management."

I hope, Madam President, that this discussion will put to rest the claim that because our aid is "nonmilitary" in large part, that our policy is also "nonmilitary." Let there be no mistake about it: Our policy in El Salvador is military not diplomatic; we seek the peace of a military victory, not a negotiated settlement. And our assistance programs of all types have been dedicated to tragically misguided policy.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the various material I referred to.

There being no objection, the materials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. AID TO EL SALVADOR

[In millions of dollars, in fiscal years]

Type of aid	1981	1982	1983	1984	Total
Cash transfers	44.9	100.0	120.0	120.0	384.9
Military aid	35.5	82.0	81.3	64.8	263.6
Economic aid	33.4	58.3	78.8	41.3	211.8
Food for sale	26.2	27.3	39.0	32.0	124.5
Food, humanitarian	9.1	7.7	7.7	5.3	29.8
Total	149.1	275.3	326.8	263.4	1,014.6

Note.—Figures from AID and Congressional Research Service. Cash Transfers are the portion of the Economic Support Fund given directly to the Salvadoran Central Bank for balance of payments purposes. Military aid does not include cost of maintaining 55 U.S. advisors, or various associated costs borne by the Department of Defense. Economic aid includes ESF not used for balance of payments purposes and all Development Assistance. Certain Disaster Assistance expenses are not tabulated by AID at the country level, and are not included. Roughly $100 million in commercial guarantees by the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Housing Investment Guaranty Program are not included. Local currencies generated for use by the Salvadoran government are equal to the total of Cash Transfers and Food for sale, since the government parcels out these forms of aid to private groups in exchange for colones.

PROPOSED U.S. AID TO EL SALVADOR

[In millions of dollars in fiscal year]

Type of Aid	1984 Supplemental	1985	Total
Cash transfers	90.0	210.0	300.0
Regional cash transfer	7.5	60.0	67.5
Military aid	178.7	132.5	311.2
Regional military aid	25.0	20.0	45.0
Economic aid	30.0	80.0	110.0
Regional economic aid	7.9	39.3	47.2
Food aid, total	14.0	51.1	65.1
Total	353.1	592.9	946.0

Note.—Figures from AID and State Department advance figures and discussions with personnel. Cash Transfers are the portion of the Economic Support Fund given directly to the Salvadoran Central Bank or other governmental agencies for balance of payments purposes. Regional Cash Transfers are estimates: 50 percent of proposed cash aid to import agencies sponsored by the region's governments. With Nicaragua and Guatemala excluded from receiving aid from thee funds, a 50 percent share for El Salvador is not unlikely. Military aid does not include cost of maintaining 55 U.S. advisors, or various associated costs borne by the Department of Defense. Regional Military Aid is for a training center in Honduras that will train predominantly Salvadoran soldiers. Economic aid includes ESF not used for balance of payments purposes and all Development Assistance. Not included are some Disaster Assistance funds and commercial guarantees by the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Housing Investment Guarantee Program. Regional Economic Aid is, again, 50 percent of regional accounts other than cash transfers.

SALVADOR IS FAULTED ON DIVERSION OF AID IN AUDITORS' REPORT

(By Raymond Bonner)

WASHINGTON.—The Salvadoran Government lacks an effective mechanism for preventing the diversion of United States aid money, according to a confidential report prepared for the Agency for International Development.

One result, according to the report, is that a Salvadoran importer can "obtain foreign exchange for transfers to his offshore account." In addition, the report found that some Salvadoran businessmen were reporting "that either political influence or payoffs are necessary to obtain timely financing for imports."

The 100-page report was prepared by Arthur Young & company, a private consulting company under contract to A.I.D., and completed in June 1983.

At a Congressional hearing late in January, Representative Michael D. Barnes, Democrat of Maryland and chairman of the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee on Latin America, referred to the report and said it showed "rampant corruption and mismanagement" in the use of United States aid to El Salvador.

He asked that the report be made public, but Administration officials refused and it remains confidential.

Jay S. Morris, deputy administrator of A.I.D., said tonight that the report was paid for by A.I.D. but prepared at the request of the Central Bank of El Salvador. Asked why the report had been kept confidential, Mr. Morris said it was done for the same reason that a report for a private American company would be held private by the company, in this case with the added confidentiality called for in a discussion of exchange rates. Mr. Morris said the Salvadoran bank, although a national institution, was comparable to a private company.

Of the finding that the Salvadoran Government lacked an effective mechanism for preventing the diversion of United States A.I.D. funds, Mr. Morris said: "It lacks a foolproof mechanism, not an effective one. To imply that there is no control and that the situation is rampant is incorrect."

In 1983, the amount of "private sector support" funds to El Salvador from the Agency for International Development was $127 million. The funds are distributed by the Salvadoran Central Bank to Salvadoran businessmen so that they will have the dollars to purchase imports from the United States.

There has been concern in Congress that United States aid funds end up in bank accounts in Miami and Europe and that importers seeking to defraud the system present a false or inflated invoice to the Central Bank overstating the price of the product being imported. The Central Bank then gives the importer dollars for this fraudulent amount. The difference between the real price and the inflated price is then deposited in a United States or European bank.

Mr. Morris, the A.I.D. official, said of that assertion, "To my knowledge, not a single dollar of A.I.D. money has been attributed to those transactions."

Two years ago the Agency for International Development assured Congress that the Salvadoran Government would impose safeguards against the diversion of United States aid money. In a letter to Representative Clarence D. Long, chairman of the House committee that oversees foreign aid appropriations, A.I.D. said the Salvadoran Government "will undertake to improve its procedures for detecting the use of inflated invoices in import transactions."

In addition, the Salvadoran Government promised "to develop a system for price checking of import transactions to identify and take appropriate action against violations of capital flight regulations."

The Salvadorans did set up a price-checking unit as promised, in January 1982.

But the Arthur Young report found that the problem of false pricing by importers "appears to be far beyond the control of the three people in the Price-Checking Unit" at the Salvadoran Central Bank.

"The Price-Checking Unit does not appear to have a satisfactory system for identifying questionable invoices nor a comprehensive, up-to-date basis for ascertaining if the prices are correct," the report says. "Moreover, they might be susceptible to pressure and possible intimidation even if they do discover invoices that have been overstated."

The auditors concluded, "A key question is whether there is sufficient political will, or desire, to enforce the administrative controls."

U.S. FOOD FOR DISPLACED SALVADORANS DIVERTED BY CORRUPTION AND BAD MANAGEMENT

(By Chris Hedges)

SAN VICENTE, EL SALVADOR.—The Salvadoran government agency responsible for distributing the bulk of AID food to displaced people is riddled with corruption and suffers from mismanagement, it is charged here.

Further, the United States Agency for International Development (AID) and the U.S. Embassy are described as having used the Salvadoran agency to pressure residents of camps for displaced people into leaving them.

The charges against the National Committee for Displaced People (Conades), its coordinating office in the department of San Vicente, and U.S. officials are leveled by many sources connected with the program, including Salvadoran military officials. The charges include:

The decision by senior AID officials to cut off food in San Vicente to displaced people in an effort to force them back into the conflictive zones they have fled.

The use of donated AID food intended for displaced people, to feed the Salvadoran Army.

The fabrication of food deliveries to cover the private use of AID foodstuffs by Salvadoran government and military officials charged with the distribution.

AID officials have denied the charges, while conceding that "isolated abuses" have occurred. They claim that the displaced people in San Vicente and Chalatenango who say they have been denied food are not telling the truth.

"I know that AID has claimed that the people in the displaced-persons camp in San Vicente have been given food supplies, while the displaced people say they have not," says David Bonilla, the director of the Roman Catholic relief organization, Caritas, in San Vicente.

"We went to the camp, however, and spent several hours looking at the dates inscribed on the Conades cards needed by displaced people to receive the food. Without calling AID a liar, I'm afraid the cards back up the claims by the displaced people and not what the U.S. and Salvadoran government officials are saying."

Maria Santos Miranda, sitting inside her cramped mud hut in the displaced-persons camp, says, "We received food supplies three times in 1983, and have received them once in 1984." Conades is meant to provide food deliveries to the displaced population on a monthly basis.

Mrs. Santos holds out her card for inspection. According to her card and dozens of others inspected in the camp, the dates of delivery in 1983 were April 28, Aug. 11, and Oct. 5. The 1984 delivery was according to these cards, on Feb. 9.

The decision to cut back food delivery to the displaced people in San Vicente was made by senior AID officials, according to one Salvadoran government official involved in the food distribution program and military officials in San Vicente.

The former director of the food distribution program in San Vicente, Lt. Col. Juan Pablo Gálvez, allowed the undelivered food to be sold or used to feed Army troops, according to these sources.

"When Gálvez was ousted in November," says one Salvadoran military official, "the soldiers stopped eating AID food. But before that you could see truckloads of it headed out to feed troops in the field."

Private and church relief officials have said for some time that AID food was being used to feed the Salvadoran Army.

The quantity of food supplied to each displaced family in San Vicente during 1983 is not specified on the Conades cards, although the cards have a box where the quantity should be recorded. Displaced people say the food rations in 1983 were very small, and well below the amount they should have been allotted.

"I assume they didn't write in the numbers because they didn't give us what we should have gotten," says Emilia Martínez, who lives in the camp.

In Chalatenango, displaced people, who occupy an abandoned granary and sleep in what were formerly pigsties, say Conades officials write down on their ration cards figures that are usually double the amount of food given them.

"They assume that because we are all poor, none of us can read the numbers on our cards to understand how they are cheating us," says one.

"It's true that we haven't been able to hand out the allotted amount of food," says the Conades director for the department of Chalatenango, David Rivera Medranos. "But that is because it is not sent to us from the capital."

Medranos denies that Conades has falsified the quantities of food deliveries.

The displaced people say that rather than deliver the food, as AID regulations specify, the displaced people—mostly small children, women, and elderly men—must walk 1½ miles to the Conades office in Chalatenango to get the food, then carry it back.

Medranos says this has been his policy because "the displaced people got used to walking, and it would be hard to break them of the habit."

He says preparations are being made to being a delivery system. Medranos also claims that canvas beds or mats are not provided to the displaced people, most of whom sleep together in an abandoned warehouse on a cement floor, "because they're Indians, and Indians are more accustomed to sleeping on the ground."

But the displaced people say the cement floor makes sleep nearly impossible.

AID will expand its aid program to Conades in 1984. About $40 million worth of AID humanitarian assistance funds will be directed toward displaced people. Some $10 million will be given to Conades to begin a displaced-persons relocation program in June or July.

The plan calls for 20 percent of the displaced persons living in the camps, estimated at 100,000, to be relocated. The program, say sources familiar with it, will be modeled on the Israeli relocations in the West Bank.

AMENDMENT NO. 2887

(Purpose: To require specific statutory authorization before the introduction of any United States Armed Forces into or over El Salvador, and for other purposes)

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself and Senators INOUYE, BENTSEN, BIDEN, BYRD, CRANSTON, KENNEDY, DODD, BAUCUS, PELL, RIEGLE, and BINGAMAN, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), for himself, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. BYRD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. DODD, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. PELL, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. BINGAMAN, proposes an amendment numbered 2887.

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following:

"PROHIBITION ON THE INTRODUCTION OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES INTO OR OVER EL SALVADOR FOR COMBAT

"(a) United States Armed Forces shall not be introduced into or over El Salvador for combat purposes unless—

"(1) the Congress has declared war or enacted specific authorization for such use of United States Armed Forces; or

"(2) such introduction of United States Armed Forces is necessary—

"(A) to meet a clear and present danger of hostile attack upon the United States; or

"(B) to meet a clear and present danger to, and to provide essential and immediate evacuation of, citizens of the United States.

"(b) If the United States Armed Forces are introduced into El Salvador pursuant to clause (A) or (B) of subsection (a)(2), the President shall describe such grounds in the report required by section 4(a) of the War Powers Resolution (Public Law 93-148).

"(c) For the purposes of section (a) the introduction of United States Armed Forces into or over El Salvador for combat purposes shall be defined as the introduction of United States Armed Forces for the purpose of delivering weapons fire upon an enemy.

"(d)(1) Any joint resolution or bill introduced at the request of the President pursuant to subsection (a)(1) shall become the pending business of the House in which it was introduced and shall be voted on within 3 calendar days thereafter, unless such House shall otherwise determine by yeas and nays.

"(2) Such a joint resolution or bill passed by one House shall become the pending business of the other House and shall be voted on within three calendar days after it has been received, unless such House shall otherwise determine by yeas or nays.

"(3) In the case of any disagreement between the two Houses of Congress with respect to a joint resolution or bill passed by both Houses, conferees shall be promptly appointed and the committee of conference shall make and file a report with respect to such resolution or bill not later than 2 calendar days after the appointment of the committee of conference. In the event the conferees are unable to agree within 48 hours, they shall report back to their respective Houses in disagreement. Notwithstanding any rule in either House concerning the printing of conference reports in the RECORD or concerning any delay in the consideration of such reports, such report shall be acted on by both Houses not later than 1 calendar day after the conferees report back to their respective Houses.

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, I have just now given a copy of this amendment to the distinguished manager of the bill, Senator KASTEN.

I ask that Senator SASSER also be listed as a cosponsor to this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. I ask, Madam President, as a parliamentary inquiry, what the time agreement is on this amendment.

Mr. KASTEN. I say to the Senator that it is my understanding that this is the Leahy amendment relating to combat forces in El Salvador on which a 2-hour limit had been agreed.

Is that the understanding of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is correct. The time is equally divided.

Mr. KASTEN. I assume the Senator from Vermont will be in charge of 1 hour, and that this Senator will be in charge of the other hour. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. LEAHY. I also thank the Chair. That was my understanding. I appreciate the indulgence of the distinguished chairman, and the Chair on this matter.

Madam President, I spent some time in putting this amendment together. In fact, I started putting parts of it together last week. I thought about it over the weekend. I have discussed it with a number of Senators on both sides of the aisle trying to make sure that any amendment that I offered was not seen as either a conservative, liberal, or moderate amendment, but rather a sensible and honest amendment.

I did this, Madam President, for a number of reasons. As the Chair knows and my colleagues know, I go to Vermont about a third of the year—an average of about 1 of every 3 days during the year. My State is small enough that you can actually talk to the people. You can actually find out what is on their minds.

We do not have mass meetings and rallies in Vermont. We tend to have groups of 20 or 30 people, sometimes as few as half a dozen. Everywhere I have gone in Vermont—and I have found this to be a very similar situation as I have gone around the country and talked in other places—people are very, very concerned about Central America. This is not because they are Republicans, Democrats, Independents, liberals, conservatives, or moderates, but simply because they are Americans.

They are concerned that we may be headed toward war in Central America. They are concerned that we may find American soldiers fighting and dying in Central America.

I find this very, very similar to the concerns I was hearing a year ago about the situation in Lebanon. Not enough was done at that time by the Congress. Certainly very little was done by the Congress to insure that American forces would not be fighting and dying in Lebanon.

Whether that is the reason or not, we can look back to last fall and realize that American forces did both fight and die in Lebanon, and the Congress did nothing. It did nothing before. It did nothing afterward. We were treated to one of the greatest foreign policy failures of a generation.

Now we have the American people greatly concerned about whether we are to have a repeat performance in Central America, and whether we will be fighting in El Salvador.

Madam President, this goes way beyond the question of which side we should support in Central America. It goes way beyond the question of whether Mr. Duarte or Mr. D'Aubuisson eventually wins. It goes way beyond the question of which guerrilla force is good, bad, or indifferent.

All of those, of course, are factors.

All of those are factors, but it goes to the greater question: Should American ground forces, or American air forces, or naval forces be introduced into combat in Central America, especially into El Salvador? El Salvador is situated uniquely enough that we could employ a combination of sea power, air power, and ground forces.

There is a very real concern, a legitimate concern and a legitimate reason to believe that American Armed Forces may be introduced into combat in El Salvador. If that happens, we will have taken a remarkable step not only in El Salvador, but in Central America.

If I did not think, based on what I have heard, what I have learned, and what I have been told, that there was a real possibility of American Armed Forces in Central America, I do not believe I would introduce this amendment. But, because I do have that concern, as do a number of other Senators on both sides of the aisle, I have introduced this amendment. I have tried to draw it in such a way that we do not take a position on the political positions of the various parties in El Salvador.

What we are faced with is a clear question: Should American Armed Forces be sent into combat in El Salvador?

In January 1981, if I could go back for a little bit of history, the guerrillas in El Salvador launched their so-called final offensive. The offensive failed, and the Reagan administration took office at a time when it appeared that a relatively cheap and easy military victory could be had in El Salvador.

However, things have not quite worked out the way the administration had hoped or would have had the Congress and the American people believe. In March 1981, the administration nearly doubled—to 45—the number of U.S. military advisers in El Salvador. That move created concern in the Congress, particularly as it related to possible war powers implications. However, the administration assured us that the advisers would operate only in nonhostile areas and would be equipped only with sidearms for protection.

Over the past 3 years and $1 billion in economic and military aid to El Salvador, the guerrillas, who numbered 3,000 to 5,000 in 1981, have grown to 9,000 to 12,000 and control at least 20 percent of the countryside. Even after all this U.S. aid, the Salvadoran economy is in tatters, with about a third of the labor force unemployed. Thousands, including eight Americans, have been murdered by rightwing death squads and not one killer has been convicted.

Millions have been spent on training the Salvadoran Army to carry the fight to the guerrillas.

Today, our military advisers are carrying submachineguns or automatic weapons. We have even received reports that some of our trainers have come under hostile fire in El Salvador.

The Washington Post reported last week that U.S. aircraft are now providing reconnaissance and communications support for Salvadoran troops during combat operations.

According to the March 29, 1984 Washington Post:

> One Salvadoran officer said he gets information during combat on guerrilla locations "instantly," transmitted from the planes above.

OVI Mohawk observation planes based at Palmerola airfield in Honduras fly reconnaissance missions for the Salvadoran Army.

As the Post article pointed out:

> . . . the Reagan administration's self-imposed limit of 55 military advisers has been skirted over the last 6 months by redefining the categories of U.S. military personnel stationed here. The practical effect has been to raise the authorized size of the advisory team without challenging congressional critics by formally abandoning the 55-man limit.

Thus, in addition to the 55 advisers, there are another 11 staff members of the military group for a total of 66. U.S. military personnel in El Salvador now include 17 permanent and 9 temporary staff members in the defense attaché's office, up from a permanent staff of 6 a year ago. U.S. advisers often stay in brigade headquarters to assist provincial commanders in organizing staff, deploying forces, and training recruits.

According to press reports, there are 300 U.S. Army pilots, maintenance men, and intelligence specialists who operate the reconnaissance flights over El Salvador from Palmerola Air Base in Honduras. Another 170 U.S. soldiers have been training Salvadoran soldiers at the Regional Military Training Center in Puerto Castilla, Honduras.

The war is going so badly in El Salvador that it was reported in the March 19, 1984, edition of Newsweek that the Central Intelligence Agency and Gen. Paul Gorman, the head of U.S. Southern Command, were pressing for the use of AC-130 Spectre gunships flown by the CIA to be used in El Salvador. While it was also reported the President rejected the proposal, the same Newsweek article stated that administration officials were considering supplying the Salvadorans with AC-47 gunships which were used with devastating effect in Vietnam against civilians and insurgents alike. However, since the AC-47 does not carry the sophisticated electronic gear necessary for locating insurgents that the AC-130 gunships do, that function would have to be performed by the AV-1 Mohawks flown by U.S. pilots out of Honduras.

Madam President, I am not trying to give a lecture similar to what might be given at the War College. What I am trying to do is make a point. We are finding ourselves slip-sliding into an Americanization of this war. If we have these observation planes coming under hostile fire, do we not have to send our people in to return the fire and protect our own people?

Does it really take much of a fertile imagination to see how quickly we are going to be in a situation where American combat forces are going to be facing hostile fire and are going to be returning hostile fire?

Does it take much imagination to see how quickly we will be in a situation where Americans will be dying in combat in El Salvador?

This has been alluded to in some other amendments on the floor of this Senate in the past week, particularly the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Senator KENNEDY. The junior Senator from Massachusetts, Senator TSONGAS, and Senator DODD, and a host of others have raised this concern.

We have talked about Vietnam and its history. We saw where a few advisers became more advisers, and before we knew it, we had combat troops in a combat situation.

Again I emphasize to my colleagues, I am not offering this amendment simply as an exercise. No, I am offering this amendment because of my clear conviction that we are going to reach the point of American combat forces in El Salvador within the year. Does it take much imagination to see the Hobson's choice we are going to be faced with if American forces go in, in whatever number, and if American combat forces tragically die in El Salvador? We will be faced with a Hobson's choice of doing one of two things: maintaining American honor by escalating the war and making it an American war, or saying, like in Lebanon, once again we have been defeated and withdraw.

I call that a Hobson's choice because I do not really see where either one is going to be very acceptable to the American people. The Senate has a chance today to make sure we do not face that Hobson's choice.

Mr. President, what we are seeing is an Americanization of the war in El Salvador. As the Salvadoran Armed Forces demonstrate they do not have the capability or willingness to achieve a military victory in that country, U.S. involvement becomes deeper and deeper. And as U.S. involvement becomes deeper and deeper, the Salvadoran Armed Forces will have less and less incentive to do the fighting required to achieve that military victory.

What the United States is attempting to do is to accomplish with airpower and high technology what the Salvadoran Armed Forces refuse to do on the ground.

If that does not bring forth the spector of Vietnam, I do no know what will.

That is why I am offering this amendment which would prohibit the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into or over El Salvador for combat purposes. To do so, the President would first have to obtain a declaration of war from the Congress or a specific authorization for use of U.S. combat forces in El Salvador.

The President would retain the authority to deploy U.S. combat forces in El Salvador if it were necessary to meet a clear and present danger of hostile attack upon the United States or for the purpose of evacuating citizens of the United States from El Salvador.

Finally, in the event that a minority in the Congress would seek to block a resolution declaring war or the President's authorization request, my amendment provides that such a request would be treated as a priority item and subject to expedited procedures. The maximum timeframe for acting upon such a request would be 9 days. The minimum would be 3 days if each House agreed and moved in concert with one another.

Three years ago, the guerrillas in El Salvador were on the verge of collapse. Three years ago and $1 billion later, the guerrillas have become stronger, the U.S. involvement deeper, and the conflict widens. It is time for the Congress to go on record and send a strong signal that this war is not going to become an American war. We will not fight a war that the Salvadorans are unwilling to fight themselves.

Finally, many of my colleagues might be willing to spend huge sums of money in El Salvador—sums of money which have increased the corruption in that country making this war a big business for the military. However, how many of us in this body are willing to send American boys to die in El Salvador while Salvadoran officers enjoy the fruits of their corruption in the safety of Miami or Houston?

Madam President, I think every one of us knows the Salvadorans will continue to get American aid, that foreign aid increases will be approved. American tax dollars will pay for foreign aid down there, no matter how I or others feel. American military aid will continue to go to El Salvador. No matter how I feel, American economic aid will still go to El Salvador. That is probably what the majority opinion of the Congress is, and, of course, that is the way democracy works.

But I would strongly urge my colleagues that there is no majority mandate in this country to have Americans go to fight and die in El Salvador.

There is no mandate in this country to have American Armed Forces make an American war out of the internal conflicts of El Salvador. While we can argue what may or may not be the mandate of the American people for the expenditure of foreign aid in El Salvador, Madam President, I defy anybody in this body to stand up and tell me that there is a mandate in the country at large or in their State for American forces to be involved in combat in El Salvador.

Madam President, I have drawn this amendment clearly and carefully; I have drawn it in consultation with those who have opposed some of the aid requests that we have voted on, and those who have voted for those aid requests.

I have done this to demonstrate that this is an amendment that is carefully and artfully drawn to make sure that we go on record to answer the question: "Are we willing to give a blank check to allow American Armed Forces in El Salvador, or are you saying American Armed Forces should not go down to fight in El Salvador unless the people in the country through their elected representatives say so?"

Often, it is easy in a legislative body, certainly in the U.S. Senate, to be able to talk in broad generalities and pass the buck to whoever is President; then, as steps are taken, whether in El Salvador or anywhere else, to say, "Well, it was not on my watch. I never voted on that, I never agreed to that." If it works out, you can say, "Of course, I would have been in favor of it." If it does not work out, you can say, "Well, I was against it all the time. I was saying so to a cab driver the other day as I was coming up here, how much I was against that."

Madam President, that is not good enough on an issue that has really been brought to the attention of the American people at large. They expect more of us than that. They expect us to stand up. With this amendment, we can. With an "aye," you are saying that you are not in favor of American forces fighting in El Salvador and making American war; with a "nay," you are saying the administration can go ahead and do anything it wants.

Madam President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me 12 minutes?

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, I yield to the Senator from Massachusets.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, first of all I want to congratulate the Senator from Vermont and also express the appreciation of our other colleagues who have joined in cosponsoring this amendment on this legislation. I think it has been a very useful debate to date on our Central America policy. The discussion and debate that we had last Thursday on a related matter of American combat troops in El Salvador revealed clearly the administration's position on this issue. It also revealed the dangers of failing to take sufficient action to insure that the Members of this body have an opportunity to participate in any decision that would involve American combat troops in El Salvador.

Madam President, I strongly support this amendment, and I urge other Members of the U.S. Senate to support it too.

When our Founding Fathers inscribed within the Constitution of the United States the power to declare war, they fully intended that the Congress of the United States and, through the Congress of the United States, the people of the United States would be involved in any decision to use American combat troops. They would be involved in such a decision that could cost American lives. I do not believe there is really any question about that.

I think anyone who takes the time, as I did a number of years ago, to read the debate in the Constitutional Convention about that particular provision would find very ample justification and reasoning for that position. They would also find there was virtual unanimity among our Founding Fathers in that interpretation. So, Madam President, I commend the Senator from Vermont and our other colleagues who have joined with us in this debate and recommend that the Senate adopt this amendment.

The amendment is a simple one and it is clear. It says no blank check for Ronald Reagan to send combat troops into El Salvador. It says Congress recognizes the constitutional responsibility that it has. It says we have the will and the courage to say now, before it is too late, that there shall be no repeat of Vietnam in Central America and there shall be no Gulf of Tonkin in El Salvador.

How many times, Madam President, do we have to learn the lesson of Vietnam, where some 50,000 Americans died in an undeclared war, a nonwar, while Congress hid its head in the sand? The time to prevent a tragedy is now and the time to protect the lives of young Americans is now.

This is an important amendment. It is important to the Constitution of the United States. It is important to our foreign policy in Central America. It is important to the American people.

Why is it important?

Last Thursday, I offered two amendments that, in many respects, are similar if not identical to the amendment being proposed by Senator LEAHY today. What prompted me to introduce those amendments then—and what makes me support this amendment today—is my fear that the administration is slowly but surely putting our combat troops in harm's way, that the administration is slowly but surely moving U.S. troops into the middle of the warfare in El Salvador—and that this is happening without the consent of the U.S. Congress.

I believe that the U.S. Congress should play some rule in the decision to send combat troops to El Salvador. I believe that the Constitution of the United States intended the Congress of the United States to play a role in the decision to send our troops into war. And I believe that the people of the United States would like to have some say in whether our sons are to be sent into combat.

Last Thursday, a report in the Washington Post informed us for the first time that U.S. pilots were flying reconnaissance missions inside of El Salvador and were telling Salvadoran commanders on the ground where there were concentrations of guerrilla troops. Then, during the debate that morning on the floor of the Senate, I heard Senator SASSER tell us that, not only were U.S. personnel actively involved in directing operations on the ground, but U.S. trainers had in fact been fired on—on three different occasions—while on duty in El Salvador.

Madam President, I was concerned then, and I am concerned now that President Reagan is leading this Nation down a slippery slope. It is the same slippery slope that got us into the war in Vietnam. First, there are advisers and training camps. Then there are military exercises and reconnanaissance flights. And ultimately U.S. forces are actively involved in the combat.

I disagree profoundly with this policy. I do not believe that the people of the United States, in their wisdom, would choose to send U.S. troops to El Salvador for purposes of combat. But certainly, the United States of America should not send its men to war unless the Congress and the people of the United States are first consulted.

That is what this most recent amendment will require. This amendment will not hinder the Commander in Chief when it comes to defending American lives or meeting a clear and present danger of hostile attack upon the United States. The language is clear. The President is free, instantly and under his own direction and without consulting Congress, to introduce U.S. Armed Forces into combat "to meet a clear and present danger of hostile attack upon the United States or to meet a clear and present danger to, and to provide essential and immediate evacuation of citizens of the United States."

If the President wants to introduce U.S. Armed Forces into El Salvador for combat purpose, however, he must first obtain specific authorization from the Congress.

Is this an unreasonable requirement? I think not.

Does this tie the President's hands? I think not.

Is this a provision that will be supported by the people of the United States? I think so.

Let us vote responsibly. Let us vote reasonably. Let us vote for the Leahy amendment.

Mr. LEAHY. Madam President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LEAHY. How much time remains under the control of the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont has 30 minutes and 43 seconds.

Mr. LEAHY. It is my understanding, Madam President, that the Senator from Delaware seeks time.

Mr. BIDEN. Madam President, I do.

Mr. LEAHY. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Madam President, as a cosponsor, I rise in support of this amendment.

Madam President, as you well know, we have been debating for some time now, not only on the floor but for the past 8 months in the Foreign Relations Committee, the issue of the prospect, the possibility, and extent to which American combat forces should be, can be, and are in fact involved in El Salvador. We have had a great deal of discussion over the past several days, and we will continue to have additional discussion on this appropriation bill, about the conditions that should be attached to aid to El Salvador, about the prospects for American interests and human rights in that region depending on the outcome of the election that will shortly take place in El Salvador.

In short, we have had debate essentially upon the wisdom of the policy that this administration has pursued thus far, not only with regard to El Salvador but the whole region.

Madam President, the reason why I believe this amendment is so important within the context of this debate is that the issue in the minds of most Americans, at least this American, is whether or not we once again as a nation are going to find ourselves in a position where we financially and militarily back a government which for whatever reason ultimately is incapable of rallying the support of its own people to resist the armed efforts of, in this case, the leftists and particularly the Communists to take over the Government.

We are faced, and particularly by this administration, I might add, with Hobson's choices. In my view, the mistakes made immediately upon entering office by this administration in this area of the world have brought about a series of events which have culminated in the debate we are having today—whether or not there is any rational policy for the United States of America with any real prospect of success in that region of the world. We are split—we are split as Democrats, we are split as Republicans, we are split as Senators, we are split as Congresspersons—as to what course of action we should follow. We argue whether or not pulling out all aid will in fact cause the collapse of a regime that has been unable to deal with death squads, unable to institute any real semblance of justice in that country, a collapse that will be at the hands of the "dreadful Communists." We are told by some that if we do that we will have another Cuba in the Isthmus.

We are told that if we give enough aid, military and economic, to the forces of the Government of El Salvador they will be able to turn back communism and preserve American interests in the region. And so we argue about how much is enough and what we have to do to keep some sense of equilibrium, enough to keep this Government in place and keep the rebels from winning but not so much that this Government can continue the outrageous policies associated with it and its military for the past years. We come down on different sides of that issue, as reasonable men and women differ, but I hope there is one thing we all agree on—we are not going to let happen what happened to my generation, and that is to allow the next generation of young men and women, if in fact the need arises, to slide into a war, slide into it because the Government we are backing is incapable of gaining the backing of its own people to resist this Communist aggression that so frightens us all.

Madam President, we tend when we make the wrong guess and put American prestige on the line to be given only one of two choices as a practical matter. We either find the Government we are supporting unable to rally the support of its people and win on its own with our financial and military help or we find ourselves in the position, as our conservative friends say, of cutting and running or sending American boys to fight in the place of Salvadorans who are allegedly fighting for the freedom and the salvation of their country.

Madam President, the President of the United States tells us that he has no intention of sending American men to fight in El Salvador. He has told us in the Foreign Relations Committee for the past year and a half that we only have 55 advisers there to help train the Salvadorans. We have been told by the military time and again that this training process is really moving along—shades of "Vietnamization is really working. We are really on our way. It is really going to work." He says that although we could train Salvadoran forces outside the country of El Salvador, and here in the United States even better, it costs more, and he does not want to restrict us in terms of where we can train them. But in the process some of us cynics from the Vietnam age are reminded of similar things we were told about how Americans were not involved, about how we were only training, but how gradually and gradually and gradually our presence built up.

Mr. JEPSEN assumed the Chair.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I had an amendment that I had intended to offer, which I will not call up because it is in a sense merged with the Leahy amendment, which would have said to the President of the United States, "Mr. President, no funds appropriated in this act or any other act can be used to sustain the presence of more than 55 American soldiers or trainers equipped for combat in El Salvador and 14 or 15 marines at our mission," if that is what he says is all he wants to do. But for a whole range of reasons and for the sake of unity, I am not proposing that amendment. I am supporting strongly the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. President, the reason why I so vigorously support this amendment is that it is essential that the U.S. Senate and the Congress go on record to say, "Mr. President, we are taking you at your word. We are going to hold you to your word. We are not going to send American troops to fight in El Salvador unless the Salvadorans are willing to to it themselves." And so what this does, it seems to me, is set out a series of exceptions which are consistent with the War Powers Act that in fact put us in a position of saying clearly to the President, "We are taking you at your word, no Americans fighting in El Salvador."

In the amendment there are several exceptions for the faint of heart who do not want to be so bold as to go on record and say, "Mr. President, just do not send them." One is: "If armed forces are necessary to meet a clear and present danger of a hostile attack upon the United States or, two, to meet a clear and present danger to, and provide the immediate evacuation of U.S. citizens."

Mr. President, I conclude by saying let us not do to the generation of young people who are 18 to 25 what was done to my generation and the generation of the Senator from Wisconsin and the generation of the Senator from Vermont and others on the floor. Let us not find ourselves sliding gradually and almost imperceptibly into a direct U.S. involvement that will result in body bags with Americans in them coming back through the Dover Air Force Base, as happended in Lebanon.

Let us speak clearly and make it clear to the President: "Mr. President, do not send Americans troops to El Salvador for combat missions. Just don't do it."

Mr. LEAHY and Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I should like to address a housekeeping question to the Senator from Delaware.

The Senator stated in the debate that he intended not to offer his amendment relating to El Salvador, and I wonder at this point, for housekeeping purposes, if the Senator would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BIDEN. I would rather not do that at this time. I fully intend to do that. It depends on how his amendment is treated. I would rather not do it now.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Kansas such time as she may desire, to speak on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, before the Senator yields to the Senator from Kansas, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator from Wisconsin yielding time to me for a question I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont.

The interest of the Senator from Vermont in Central America, and specifically El Salvador, has been one of very thoughtful consideration over the last couple of years, as he has watched the evolvement of affairs there. But does he not feel that the War Powers Resolution, as it is written, does effectively cover any eventuality of U.S. troop involvement in El Salvador?

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas also has given a great deal of time to the problems of Central America, both by visits there and work in committee, and she asks a very valid question.

The War Powers Act, as we found in Lebanon when, for the first time it was required to be used, left a great deal to be desired. If it were to be used much the same way in Central America, we could find ourselves in a full-scale war in Central America before we would even get around to reading the fact sheet on the War Powers Act. That is why this is written very, very specifically as to El Salvador. That is why it is intended, really, as a vote on the introduction of American combat forces in El Salvador.

If we had something as specific, for example, in Lebanon, we would not have had the debacle there that we had.

I feel that the War Powers Act, at least in the way it was pushed aside by Congress in Lebanon, is not adequate for the circumstances we face today.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I say to the Senator from Vermont that I share his concerns. However, I think it is a seriously flawed policy if we, on the floor of the U.S. Senate, are making a determination on a vote of whether, as the Senator said, we are in favor or not in favor of sending our Armed Forces to fight in El Salvador. I think that, at that point, we are really usurping the authority that lies with the President of the United States as Commander in Chief.

I am just as concerned as is the Senator from Vermont, but I think there are other ways that we have to work to address those issues, rather than taking this kind of almost demagogic position on the floor of the U.S. Senate.

As I say, I think it becomes a seriously flawed policy and should be of grave concern to us, so far as what our role is and what it should be in a determination of whether troops should or should not go into any area around the world.

Mr. LEAHY. In answer to the Senator from Kansas, the amendment is not meant as a demagogic one. I leave the demagoguery to others who may be so inclined in this body. I think I have probably demonstrated as much restraint in that area, in my 10 years, as just about anybody else in this body.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I certainly agree with that, and I did not mean to imply that the Senator was, but I think the tone of the language could be read that way.

Mr. LEAHY. I have listened carefully to what the Senator from Kansas has said. She knows of the great respect I have for her in the way she approaches any problem in this body. But we are not talking about a prohibition anywhere in the world. We are talking about a prohibition in a very specific place—El Salvador.

There are the normal abilities for the Commander in Chief to act in case of clear and present danger of hostile attack upon the United States. Notwithstanding this amendment, the Commander in Chief can move in to meet a clear and present danger to citizens of the United States in El Salvador. Nothing restricts that.

The Senator from Kansas knows as well as I do that there exists the potential for American troops to go there. Plans have already been discussed for American troops to go there—even if it is in the hypothetical form. We should not say that our responsibility is simply to give them more foreign aid but not to say anything about American troops. That is why I say that this amendment, whether voted on up or down or as a tabling motion, puts us on record as saying whether we do or do not allow American troops to go in there. We ought to say so.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I yield.

Mr. BIDEN. The Senator from Kansas makes a very valid point. Technically, the War Powers Act does cover all this; and technically, in my view, we have some disagreement on my side; but technically, in my view, it is somewhat redundant.

However, the fact of the matter, I say to the Senator from Kansas, is that this is not like any other circumstance around the world. What we are really saying here is that we believe the policy of this administration is a flawed policy and that the problem is that we, in this body—we, in Congress—have limited tools with which we can deal to impact upon any administration's policy.

If you wait for the invocation of the War Powers Act, what has occurred is already beyond our control in the case when we can see what is coming. We already know as much about this situation as the President does, and I respectfully suggest that we know more—that is, the cumulative body—than this administration does.

So what we are saying here is that the reason why you must go this far is that if you wait for the War Powers Act to be invoked, we will already be beyond the pale, and we can see where this fellow is taking us. We can see what is happening. Maybe the Senator from Kansas disagrees about what I believe to be the intention of this administration.

I believe that the day after President Reagan is reelected—if he is reelected—we will find American troops fighting in Latin America, and this is the only preemptive thing we have under our control to do.

I fully believe that if he is reelected, by this time next year, we will have Americans fighting in El Salvador.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I only comment on that, that we do not know and it is, I think, a dangerous assumption to try and make a prediction such as that.

What we do know is that there is a very fragile, dangerous situation which exists in El Salvador. I think that some purpose has been served by the very forthright and frank debate on the concerns in El Salvador at this time, but I think to take this type of action, as I say, really leads us on a path which is a flawed policy.

I yield back time to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Vermont to yield me 2 minutes.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator requires.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I think you have to make assumptions. We know enough to make assumptions. This body is not like the three monkeys: we do not put our hands over our eyes, mouths, and ears.

Assumptions can and should be made based upon the track record. The track record is clear. We have thousands of troops in Honduras. We have naval maneuvers in the area. We have trainers in El Salvador. American combat men are being shot at.

There are assumptions we must make, just as when I rose on the floor to introduce the effort to stop the placement of troops in Lebanon. Some rose and said we cannot make those assumptions.

Why do we assume that the past is not prolog? Why do we assume or why are we asked not to assume what is logically likely to happen?

And there is as much of a chance—and I defy anyone to give me evidence to the contrary—of the Salvadoran Army not making it as making it. And what do we do if it does not make it?

The same question we asked about Lebanon. We were told there was a ceasefire. I stood on the floor and said it is stupid to make the assumption the ceasefire will last.

When asked why, I said, look at history. There is no history to indicate that a ceasefire would hold—none, zero.

So when we say we cannot make assumptions, fine, make no assumptions, Senate, and continue to act in a way that demonstrates we do not have the right to participate in the formation of American foreign policy because the assumption is—mine may be wrong, but it is not reasonable to make it—that it is a possibility at a minimum that we are contemplating the use of American combat forces in that region of the world and in El Salvador in particular.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I agreed to yield time to the Senator from Hawaii and the Senator from West Virginia.

How much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 16 minutes and 10 seconds remaining.

Mr. LEAHY. I yield to the Senator from Hawaii such time as he needs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, this amendment will not deny the President of the United States any of his powers or authorities as Commander in Chief of this country. Nor will it minimize his authority as President of the United States.

All it does, very simply, is to reaffirm once again the wisdom of our Founding Fathers. When the Constitution of the United States was debated and drafted, it was made certain that the President of the United States would not be a king or an emperor, or dictator, that the Congress of the United States would be comprised of representatives of the people of the United States who would participate in all of the important decisions of this land and, of all the important decisions of this land, I cannot think of anything more important than the decision to shed the blood of our citizens.

Mr. President, the least this body can do on this day is to adopt this amendment. It is a good amendment. It says very simply that the Congress of the United States will be called upon to decide with the President whether it will be proper to shed American blood on foreign soil.

I support the amendment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEAHY. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Vermont.

Mr. President, the pending amendment has been offered in an effort to insure the full participation of Congress in advance of any decision by the administration to send combat troops into El Salvador.

The amendment does not say that troops should never be used. Nor does it say that there are no circumstances in which the use of American troops would not be warranted. It only says that before such troops may be sent to fight in El Salvador, that step must be approved by the Congress of the United States.

It is my belief that the American people expect and desire their elected representatives to play just such a role. It is my view that the American people would wish to be heard before this country embarks on such a drastic step. And it is my firm conviction that this amendment would make absolutely certain that such a commitment of American men and women—to fight on foreign soil—should only be made with the full support and backing of the people of this country, because otherwise unless the action has the support of the American people it cannot for long succeed, as we have seen before.

What the amendment says is that before embarking upon such an escalation, we must pause, deliberate, and take a vote, in other words, stop, look, and listen before we jump. That is what democracy is all about. In no event is it more severely tested than with respect to send our young people, ours sons and grandsons, our daughters and granddaughters into war.

This time, as distinguished from occasions in the past, we will have to ask ourselves, "Where will this lead?" "What is our purpose?" "What is our mission?" and "What is it we are attempting to accomplish?"

Let us make sure we will look, and think, before we leap.

We were in Lebanon before we even knew why. Some of the best of our fighting men were killed without really knowing why they were in Lebanon.

Let us, in this case, assure ourselves, and the American people, that we will do everything in our power to make sure that the next time we leap, we will know how far we are leaping, and to what end. Let us make sure that the next time, we will carefully consider and debate the dispatch of our young people to combat beyond our shores. And, as distinguished from disasters of the past, let us pause for just a small moment for the American people to be heard.

I support the amendment, and I urge its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield as much time as he may desire first of all to the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, all through this debate over the last 10 days or 2 weeks we have had the constant reference to the War Powers Act, what it can do and what it cannot do. But the question that is on my mind and it is on my mind right now is where are we trying to take this country?

I heard my distinguished friend from Delaware, a very learned man, talking about what is past is prolog. I happen to be a great believer in that. I think everything we are going through today we have gone through before. The only trouble with we Americans is we never pay any attention to what has gone before.

Now, let us go back in history to the time that we adopted our first Constitution. That was when the revolution against England was coming to an end. We nearly lost that war. Why? Because the articles under which we were operating allowed the Members of the Congress not only to go out in the field, as we can do, but to make promotions and make tactical decisions and strategic decisions, until the point arrived when we were almost defeated by the British.

This is one of the main reasons that those articles were changed and why we wrote a Constitution that very specifically made the President the Commander in Chief. We gave him—and, let me remind you, him only—the right to send troops to war. To placate the Congress, we said that Congress had the right to declare war. We can declare war every 5 minutes. But under the Constitution, no troops, no aircraft, no ships are going to go into war.

Now if it is the long-range intention of those people who are trying to alter the intent of the Constitution by this amendment, then I think we should be told so. I do not think the Founding Fathers had any idea that a Congress would ever participate in the actual movement of troops or denial of troops except by the use of our one big muscle, which we have never had the courage to use, the power of the purse.

We could have stopped the war in Vietnam—not overnight because there is always money left around that can fight a war for a few days—but we could have made it perfectly clear to the Commander in Chief that we did not like the war in Vietnam and we were not going to appropriate any more money.

So I get back to the point that disturbs me. This amendment has a lot of sex appeal to it. To the average Member of Congress, I think it gives them the idea that we will never allow troops to go any place in this world regardless, without the consent of the Congress. Now if that be the intent, then I suggest a constitutional amendment would be proper to spell this thing out.

I think because of these reasons that I have recited—and I have argued this ever since we first started talking about the War Powers Act back in the 1970's, that the act is unconstitutional. And I tried at that time to get the forces to fight it and to fight it in the courts only to learn that the Court, as I learned once before by another action, the Supreme Court will not make these judgments that they call political when they feel that the President and the assembled Congress has the power and the authority to straighten them out.

Now I am opposed to this amendment. I do not think it is in the best interests of our country. I think it adds to the extreme, extreme dangers that we are living under with the War Powers Act under which, Mr. President, any country in this world could defeat us by instigating a series of incidents that would cause the President to send troops to resist and then engage some Madison Avenue types to convince the American people that the war was all wrong, that we ought to do away with it and, within 60 days, through the use of television, newspaper ads, and so forth, convince the American people that we were all wrong and we should get out. And a vote of Congress to maintain the popularity at home would hold that thought up and we would withdraw from the war and we would have lost another war.

Now we have already lost two wars in this country's history because of the intervention of civilians. We have lost the last two wars we have been in because the man in uniform, who was trained to fight wars, was not allowed to fight the wars in the way they should have been. I do not want to be a part of another war that we lose.

People may say, "But Central America is so small, we shouldn't pay any attention to it." The northern neighbors of Central America are Mexico. I live on the borders of Mexico. I can tell this body they have never been happy about the war with Mexico, which we fought without any good reason and which we won and we took land from Mexico. And many times they smilingly look at me and say, "You are living on our land and some day we are going to get it back." And I do not doubt that there will be a time in history when that effort will be made.

If we lose in Central America, to me this is the last place in the world that we have to prove ourselves to be anything but a paper tiger.

Now, I do not like war any more than anybody in this room likes war. I will do anything in the world to prevent it except get down on my knees and put my tail between my legs. This country has to show courage once in awhile.

When we went into Grenada, to me it was the greatest thing that has happened in this country in years and years and years. We did something that the world did not think we had the guts to do. And we did it.

I am not saying by this that we go into Central America, but I say that we live up to our promises to Central America, that we give them the muscle that we can, the wherewithal to train their troops, the wherewithal to fight resistance.

So I, Mr. President, am very anxious to know why this amendment is coming up, why it is coming up in this form and in the course of time ahead how many efforts are going to be made to legislatively change our Constitution until we reach the point that we reached at the end of the revolution where we were not in good shape.

Mr. President, the practical question which the pending amendment raises is whether the United States can and should be allowed to act as a world power. Does the President have a duty to react to challenges to American security in the early stages of a foreign crisis, or shall he be tied down and restricted from taking any action until the challenge is so clear that the cost of resisting is prohibitive?

The danger I see in this amendment and in the War Powers Resolution is that they attempt to take away the President's flexibility to deal with unforeseen events. The failure of Congress to approve even humanitarian legislation to support the evacuation of American citizens from Saigon in 1975 offers convincing proof that Congress cannot be counted on to deal quickly with future problems as the need arises. Unlike the President, an assembly of 535 Commanders in Chief does not rush to decision.

Mr. President, we have heard about the intentions of the Founding Fathers in this debate. But anyone who reviews history will see that Presidents ever since George Washington have used their authority as Commander in Chief to use the Armed Forces in defense of the vital interests of this Republic. Washington settled this issue when, as our first President, he ordered his Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, to threaten Spain with military force if she would not open the Mississippi River to navigation by American citizens.

When he was President, Thomas Jefferson sent a squadron of armed ships into the Mediterranean without any congressional authority, with orders to sink, burn, and destroy vessels which may threaten American commerce. Only half a year after he issued his military orders and 4 months after a naval blockade and battle had occurred did Jefferson inform Congress.

Jefferson gave an indication of the principle which guided his decisionmaking, when he wrote, on September 20, 1810, that

> A strict observance of the written laws is doubtless one of the high duties of a good citizen; but it is not the highest. The laws of necessity, of self-preservation, of saving our country when in danger, are of higher obligation.

INTENT OF THE FRAMERS

Jefferson's statement summarizes why the framers vested the President with independent powers to act for the safety of the Nation. The majority of framers had served in the army or militia during the Revolution and were intimately familiar with the restrictions which the Continental Congress had imposed on General Washington's activities, restrictions they knew had nearly lost the War of Independence. It was in order to correct this weakness of the articles of Confederation that the framers of the Constitution made the President the "Commander-in-Chief."

For example, George Mason said: "Although Congress are to raise the army * * * the President is to command without any control." Mason was an opponent of the original Federal Constitution, mainly because it did not include a Bill of Rights, but he had attended the Constitutional Convention of 1787 and participated actively in shaping the final document. He knew what it meant.

The active role of Governors in putting down civil disorders just prior to the Constitutional Convention of 1787, the evolution in early State constitutions from weak executives to strong executive, the memory of interference by the Continental Congress with military decisions of General Washington, and the entire course of practice under the Constitution from the administration of President Washington to the current administration of President Reagan, all demonstrate beyond any reasonable doubt that the fundamental and ultimate power to employ the existing forces of the United States in defense of citizens and the survival of our country, in reaction to foreign dangers, rests with the President.

The flaw in the pending amendment is that it conflicts with the Constitution itself. For example, it is in conflict with section 1 of Article II, which provides, "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States." And if it is in conflict with the first paragraph of section 2 of article II, which declares: "The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. * * *"

Just as the Court held in the Chadha case that the separation of powers had been violated by the legislative veto, so I believe the Court would hold that it is a violation of the separation of powers for Congress to claim for itself the supreme direction of the Armed Forces. The lesson of the Chadha case is that Congress cannot invade an Executive function. Congress cannot bring unto itself all the powers of Government which the framers deliberately allotted among three separate branches.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, Senator LEAHY's proposed amendment to this supplemental appropriations bill expresses the widely held belief of the American people that U.S. combat forces should not be involved in the conduct of the Salvadoran civil war. I share this feeling but do not believe that the Leahy amendment should be approved.

The administration has stated repeatedly that it has no present intention to introduce U.S. combat forces into El Salvador. Certainly, any such intention would demand the closest possible consultation with the Congress. In this light, the Leahy amendment is redundant because the War Powers Resolution already requires the President, in every possible instance, to consult with Congress before introducing U.S. Armed Forces "into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances."

Under section 4, whenever such an introduction occurs, or whenever U.S. Armed Forces equipped for combat are sent into foreign territory "except for deployments which related solely to supply, replacement, repair, or training" of U.S. forces, the President must make a detailed report to Congress within 48 hours. Under most circumstances, U.S. forces introduced into a situation of current or imminent hostilities must be withdrawn within 60 days unless their continued deployment is specifically authorized by Congress.

Certainly, a key determination under the War Powers Resolution is when hostilities are "imminent" and in this regard Senator SASSER has raised very serious questions about whether U.S. troops have been involved in actions in El Salvador that may have triggered application of the War Powers Resolution. But these are questions which we should make every attempt to resolve pursuant to the already existing mechanisms provided for in the resolution. For this reason, I have requested the Department of Defense to provide the Foreign Relations Committee with a detailed report on Senator SASSER's concerns so that the committee will then be able to assess their relevancy to the War Powers Resolution. This is the better way to proceed on this matter.

It will not be productive to call for a major amendment of this kind at a time when many Members of Congress and the administration have not had the opportunity to reflect fully on the implications of the Leahy amendment. Further, the Foreign Relations Committee has not had the opportunity to devote the attention and study to this amendment that it deserves.

What we need now is a continuing dialog with the administration on how to make the War Powers Resolution most effective in preserving the vital role of the Congress in evaluating when U.S. combat forces can and should be introduced into hostilities abroad while providing the President with the necessary flexibility to respond effectively to international events affecting U.S. strategic interests.

Finally, I believe that the Leahy amendment, if enacted, could weaken the War Powers Resolution. Country specific provisions like this one, however well intended, trivialize the broad purposes of the War Powers Resolution to provide for an effective balance between the Executive and Congress on the appropriate ways in which U.S. combat forces can and should be committed abroad. This amendment could open a Pandora's box of amendments down the line aimed at every instance—actual, prospective, or imagined—in which U.S. combat forces could be committed abroad. I believe that this would be a troublesome development.

For all these reasons, I cannot support my distinguished colleague's amendment.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair, and I thank the distinguished manager.

Mr. President, I also thank the distinguished senior Senator from Arizona. He has given us a needed review of American history and of the U.S. Constitution and has said much with great eloquence and great force that I would say.

But the essential point I think that he has made is that this amendment should be defeated as was the amendment offered last week by the Senator from Massachusetts, and for the same reasons. It is slightly recast, it is in somewhat different form, but it seeks to take, even further than the War Powers Act, an unconsitutional overreaching by the legislative branch into what is exclusively reserved by the Constitution to the President of the United States. For that reason, Mr. President, it should be rejected.

Let me just say, however, that having listened to my friend from Delaware make an impassioned plea, I am sure that his conviction is genuine when he asks that we not be guilty of acts that may lead to the shedding, unnecessarily, of the blood of American boys on foreign soil. I am sure that no Member of this body feels that any more keenly than do I. I do not think there is a moral high ground in the differences that we are expressing on the debate upon these measures. I will simply say to my friend from Delaware that, giving full good faith to his good intentions, I am convinced in my own mind that this and other amendments that have been introduced, in fact, risk the very danger that he seeks to avoid.

Because if, for example, we delay or do not grant full funding in the way of the military aid that is required for the people of El Salvador to defend themselves as they are so disposed to do against the threat that exists to their democracy from outside their nation, we risk the fall of El Salvador. We risk, next, the subversion or perhaps overt aggression against their neighbors in Honduras and ultimately an invocation of our obligation under the Rio Pact.

That is far more likely to occur, Mr. President, if the trend of the amendments that have been introduced were to be successful. But, happily, they have been defeated, and this well-intentioned amendment should also be defeated.

Perhaps the ultimate extension of the logic of Senator GOLDWATER's remarks is that my colleagues, without wittingly being so, are falling guilty of the canard that I have heard used to describe this body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for 1 minute more of the distinguished manager's time.

Mr. KASTEN. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from California 1 additional minute.

Mr. WILSON. As a new Member, I have been proud of my membership in this body. But I must admit that I have encountered those who are skeptical of this body. Some have even demeaned it by describing it as a body in which each Member, each of the 100 men and women on this floor, thinks that he or she should be President of the United States.

I dispute that. It is ridiculous on the face of it. There are only two or three of us who are actually qualified. [Laughter.]

In all seriousness, Mr. President, I say that until one has received the confidence of the American people in an election—which I hope someday will approach the magnitude of the turnout of the El Salvadoran election which I was privileged to witness two Sundays ago—we have to obey the Constitution. If we are concerned about the shedding of American blood, then the thing for us to do is promptly and without undue restriction give to these people in El Salvador, who want democracy, the means to secure it for themselves without American troops for which they are not asking.

I thank the Chair. I thank the distinguished manager.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator from Vermont yield?

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, what is the balance of my time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eleven minutes and twenty seconds.

Mr. LEAHY. I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in just a few moments the Senate of the United States will have a rollcall vote. As Members of the U.S. Senate, we will vote yea or nay on the issue as to whether the Congress of the United States should be involved in a decision to send American boys into combat in El Salvador.

Five days ago, when this debate started, we had the opportunity for the Congress of the United States to say we want to make a judgment, we want to make a decision, we want a voice, we want a vote on whether we are going to send American combat troops into El Salvador, into Honduras, and into Nicaragua; and the Senate of the United States voted no on that issue.

Then we had an opportunity to vote to keep American combat troops out of combat in Nicaragua and El Salvador, and the U.S. Senate voted no on that measure.

Now we have the opportunity, finally and lastly, the third time, the third strike, to make a judgment whether we are going to say that we will not send American combat troops into combat in El Salvador unless that action has been authorized by the Congress of the United States. We will hear the rollcall on that particular issue.

I quite frankly believe, as I believed at the start of this debate, and earlier, that we should not send American combat troops into any of those countries without explicit approval by the Congress of the United States. As was pointed out earlier in the debate, those who want to send American boys down there will have an opportunity to vote aye, and those who do not can vote no. All we are asking in this amendment is for that opportunity.

There are Members of the U.S. Senate who will say we have the War Powers Act: After the President sends American troops down to El Salvador for 60 days at the cost of how many thousands of lives, then the War Powers Act will be triggered. Then the Congress will be able to take some action. How much blood will be spilled, Mr. President? How inadequate that measure is for this particular crisis. I do not trust that this administration or this President will not commit American combat troops in El Salvador. I am not prepared to take the chance that he will not.

Having been here for some 22 years, Mr. President, I am not convinced that this body has the will, once American troops are committed in a part of the world, to say, "Stop, we have had enough of this spilling of American blood," and to bring an end to a war. The record of this body has demonstrated the kind of confidence, or the reassurance, that Members of this body ought to feel—that we can end, and stop a war. We were reluctant and too late in doing so in Vietnam. We went along for too long in Lebanon. This is our chance to say we have the opportunity to save American lives by preventing that war, rather than debating for months and perhaps years about whether we should or should not have sent in American combat troops with the loss of American lives.

Mr. President, Central America is not going to go away, although there probably are Members in this body who wish that it would. El Salvador is not going to disappear tomorrow, although maybe there are Members of this body who wish that it would. The conflict, the strife, the oppression, the poverty, the repression that exists in El Salvador is going to be there tomorrow, and the next day even if we might wish it away or put our heads in the sand.

We have to face a reality today. That is what we are reluctant to do as Members of the U.S. Senate.

We cannot evade our responsibilities to say whether we believe there should be this kind of a commitment, or whether there should not be. The issue before us today I believe, is really the first end the war amendment on El Salvador. I hope, Mr. President, that we are going to meet our responsibilities as Members of this body, as Members of this institution and fulfill that responsibility not only to the institution, but to the countless scores of young Americans who are alive today, but who may very well find death in the jungles of Central America, if we fail on this last opportunity, on this particular bill. This is the last opportunity to say that we want to have a voice, we want to have a vote, and we want to express ourselves on any decision that is going to commit the blood of young Americans.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I thank my good friend from Massachusetts for what he has said. He has defined the issue.

This is not a War Powers debate. This is not a hypothetical question. This is a very real question. This is El Salvador. We know what the stakes are. The War Powers Act is a blueprint. But, now when we have a fire about to break out in El Salvador, we do not need a blueprint. We need a fire extinguisher. That is what we have here.

American troops, Mr. President—make no doubt about it—are going to go in and fight in El Salvador. American naval forces, American Air Force, will be used for combat in El Salvador; if not this year, then next year or the year after. It is inevitable. But we are going to state our position here and now. If we are in favor of American combat forces being used in El Salvador, then they should vote against my amendment. But if we are willing to stand up and accept our responsibility, and say we do not want American combat forces involved in Central America we should vote for my amendment.

It is as simple as that. It is not intended for anything else. It is not intended as a question of how much or how little foreign aid we should give to El Salvador. It is not a question of who is good or who is bad in El Salvador. It is simply the question of will American forces be used in combat in El Salvador. Yes or no? Not Honduras, not Nicaragua, not anywhere else but El Salvador. Yes or no?

I think the American people have a right to expect that we will have enough of a sense of responsibility—all 100 Senators—to stand up and say we are either in favor of that or opposed to that. We can vote on a tabling motion. We can do it any other way. The American people are smart enough to know exactly what this vote means. This vote will put 100 Members of the United States on record, either in favor of allowing American combat forces in El Salvador or saying no. An awful lot of Senators are well aware that that is exactly the situation we are moving into.

I withhold the balance of my time.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I am reluctant to express my view on this particular amendment. I struggled with it for a long time. I understand why it has been offered. I understand fully the reasons.

I must say in all candor I think there has been a lack of adequate communication between the White House and Members of Congress in regard to the ultimate intention of this administration in Central America.

I do not think the administration has aggressively enough pursued an open channel of communication with the Congress and with the leadership of both parties so that we could hammer out a single set of bipartisan objectives and send a single and clear message to the rest of the world as to the content and meaning of our policy.

Mr. President, in my mind there is no greater need as we look at events around this world today than that we work together to develop that bipartisan spirit in international relations that our Nation needs.

As we have domestic political debates, we must be acutely aware that not only are we listening to each other, not only are Democrats and Republicans listening to each other, not only are supporters of one political candidate or another listening to each other, but people all around the world are listening to what we say.

It is our responsibility as much as it is possible to send a single, clear and understandable message to the rest of the world.

The bipartisanship in foreign policy, for which I long, is something that cannot be achieved by the Congress by itself or by the President by himself. It is going to take a good communication on behalf of both, and it is a communication that I hope begins in earnest in the near future.

So I find it very difficult to bring myself to support the pending amendment. There is an old saying that hard cases make bad law. This is one of those situations. I view the issue not only as an issue as to what should be done in El Salvador. I personally hope that we will give the local people there the appropriate tools so that it will never become necessary to face the question of whether or not there will be direct involvement of American combat troops.

I, for one, would be extremely hesitant, very reluctant, and almost certain to oppose the introduction of combat troops in that area.

But I think we are dealing with a broad constitutional issue here. We are dealing with the powers of the Commander in Chief under the Constitution. We are dealing with what powers the executive branch should have as compared with the legislative branch.

This country, Mr. President, whether the President of the United States is a Democrat or a Republican, whether the President of the United States is one whose policies I can fully embrace, or whose policies I must sometimes oppose, cannot operate with 535 Members of Congress acting as Secretary of State. This Nation cannot operate with 535 Members of Congress trying to be President of the United States. There is only one Commander in Chief. We cannot write into law, we cannot write into statute, language which can envision every possible situation that might arise.

We do not have perfect foresight. Emergencies arise, and in this terrible nuclear age in which we live, because of necessity and short warning time, the Commander in Chief, as a practical matter, is already vested with authority, if he received a 15- or 20-minute warning, to unleash massive amounts of incredible power.

I wish we did not live in a world like that, but we do. I do not think any of us would suggest that we not allow the President to have that authority because to deprive him of that authority would be a clear message to others in this world who also have immense power that we would be unable to respond in case of emergency.

I can only think, for example, that if we had a similar statutory provision in place at the time of the swift action in Grenada it would have been impossible for the Government of the United States to have acted when that nation, with dispatch, was surprised in a way which minimized the loss of American lives because of the element of surprise.

While I must say, Mr. President, that in all honesty I do not believe that this President has sufficiently done his homework, has invested the time, effort, and energy to master the facts as well as he should so that he could enter into a genuine dialog with patriotic, sincere, congressional leaders of both of our political parties and hammer out a bipartisan foreign policy, I still do not believe that this difficult situation we face, particularly as it applies to policy on Latin America, justifies what I believe is a sharp departure, the setting of an unwise precedent, in terms of the constitutional balance of power between the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States.

I certainly understand the motivation of my colleagues who have offered this amendment. Not one of us wants to bear any responsibility for the commitment of a single American combat troop into a situation in which that person should not be sent. None of us wants to bear even partial responsibility for the useless or needless loss of a single American life in combat. There are many, and I understand why they feel as they do, who would question the long-range intentions, the goals, of the current administration, and would question even more fundamentally whether they have thought through those goals to their conclusions.

I understand all of that. I respect that. To some degree, I share those doubts.

Mr. President, let us not allow hard cases to make bad law in this circumstance. We have the War Powers Act that enables us, if we fully implement it and aggressively pursue it, to prevent and to stop in short time abuses of Executive authority. That is a difficult balance to strike; it is a hard line to draw; it is an imperfect one. But I have to say in all conscience that I think that politics aside, the current issue aside, we will regret it if we set a precedent that changes the fundamental constitutional balance of responsibility and authority within the Government of the United States.

So while I salute their motivation, understand it and honor it, I simply, Mr. President, cannot feel that I can support this amendment. I hope whatever the outcome, all of us, on both sides of the aisle, on Capitol Hill and in the White House, will renew our efforts to work together, to develop a bipartisan foreign policy so that those who are our enemies and those who are our friends will know that the United States is once again capable of having a constant, defendable, widely supported foreign policy so that we can give a clear message to all around the world.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, first of all, I thank the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma who has at two or three different times now in the past week, since he has returned from observing the elections, spoken with great clarity, vision, truth, and commonsense about the situation in El Salvador. I just want to say how much all of us appreciate his contribution to this debate and to the efforts to establish the kind of bipartisan approach to foreign policy that he has so eloquently spoken to.

Mr. President, I yield such time as he may desire to the Senator from Mississippi, the distinguished ranking member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. STENNIS. Does Senator LEAHY wish to proceed?

Mr. LEAHY. Not at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, this is quite serious business. We all know that. I expressed myself on this subject generally when we had before us the proposed amendment on Lebanon.

I was one of the sponsors of the war powers legislation. I do not claim any credit for getting it passed. It turned out I was away much of the time. But I remember the pressure to change my position and vote against it in the end; the same thing when the motion to override the President's veto was pending. But I was determined that something be passed that gave a little more meaning or a clearer meaning, if possible, to that clause in the Constitution that says Congress shall have the power to declare war. It is the most difficult situation that I ever got into, trying to meet it with language. Language is not big enough, words do not have meaning enough to really cover this subject matter.

However that may be, Mr. President, I think we would be off base entirely to make this much of a limitation on the Chief Executive. We all know now, in this atomic age, the nuclear age, where in a matter of minutes—it has already been figured out how many minutes the President would have if he felt called upon to use those weapons which God forbid will ever be used, nuclear weapons. But, like it or not, I think we have to leave it short of what this proposed amendment says. It says it all in good faith.

Senator LEAHY is a very valuable member of the Committee on Armed Services. I remember he came here, was working when he got here. He impressed all of us trying to keep up with him. He is a fast learner and he got us into a lot of things. He was working on this. But I think we have to take the hard part along with the rest.

I am concerned about this part of the world. I was against the Lebanon venture, but we cannot be silent and inactive about Central America, as I see it. It is right here on our doorstep.

Mr. President, I am compelled to oppose the amendment for the reasons that I have already given and I believe we must not try to get it off our minds or try to ignore the subject or just hope for the best, but I do not believe we can have two standards about this delicate subject.

Any President, whoever he may be, and I personally saw three of them worry about Vietnam, has to have some authority. We cannot limit it under our Constitution too much. I would have to oppose the amendment and do.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am voting against tabling this amendment for basically the same reasons that I voted on a similar amendment offered by Senator KENNEDY last Thursday, March 29, 1984, as set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 7023.

That vote, as well as my earlier vote against a motion to table Senator KENNEDY's similar preceding amendment No. 2856, expressed my support for efforts to find a way to reaffirm the constitutional authority of the Congress of the United States to declare war, or to "make rules for the Government and regulation of the land and naval forces" through expressly authorizing the use of U.S. personnel in situations which may amount to war or may lead to war.

These specific proposals and this exact language may not be the best way to address this serious problem, but I believe we should now debate this issue and consider alternatives instead of merely tabling this amendment.

We cannot afford to wait until a crisis forces our hand; we must find a practical, workable solution now, while we have time for full debate and reasoned analysis. These amendments are a start and should be seriously and carefully considered by the Senate at this time.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, the present amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont certainly raises a serious issue, the necessity for congressional involvement in decisions to place combat troops in Central America. It is too broad and lacking precision to warrant passage and I support the tabling motion.

I have consistently supported congressional involvement in situations in which U.S. combat troops become directly involved in hostilities in foreign countries. During debate on this bill I supported another amendment which would have limited placement of combat troops in El Salvador and mandated congressional approval of participation of those troops in active combat hostilities. As I interpreted that amendment, it would not have forbidden use of U.S. advisers or surveillance aircraft. The present amendment is too broadly worded and would be prone to an overly general application of limits on the presence of noncombative American military personnel.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I came here just as the Vietnam war ended and it was amazing how, at the end of that year, it was hard to find a single person in Congress who supported the war. The vast majority in both the House and Senate, both parties, had all been closet opponents of the Vietnam war. I did not find a Member of the House or Senate who said they had been in favor of the Vietnam war. I always wondered who those mysterious people were who kept voting the money for Vietnam. Here is a chance for us to step up and be counted on what could well become a mini-Vietnam just off our borders.

I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, sitting in front of me, said hard cases made bad law. That does not mean you do not have to speak out against them. Hard cases left unresolved begin to stink; hard cases left unresolved begin to rot. You have to address the hard cases. This is a hard case.

As Professor Corwin said, the Constitution is little more than an invitation for the Congress and the President to battle for the authority to conduct foreign policy.

The President does not have the authority to make war, he has the authority to conduct a war. A Commander in Chief does not initiate a war, he conducts a war. We are talking about initiation as opposed to conducting, because allegedly, we are not involved in a war. That is what the President tells us, that is what our friends tell us, that is what everyone tells us.

Last, Mr. President, this is not a nuclear strike. The fact of the matter is the analogy is not at all appropriate for the following reasons.

We know that there is in fact a set of circumstances which may result in this administration, if they have already, soon committing American troops. Now, would anyone suggest to me that if it took 6 months for a missile to fly from Moscow to the United States, the Congress should play no part in determining what we should do? Is that what you are saying to me? We know what is happening down there, fellows. Is this a surprise to you? We know.

Second, in this amendment, it says, "Mr. President, we understand that if the United States is in jeopardy, you have to act quickly." We understand, Mr. President, if Americans are in jeopardy, you have to act quickly. But, Mr. President, if you want to make this an American war, short of those two things, come and tell us, let us know. Let us be part of what is our constitutional obligation, I say to my friend from California, "obligation."

That is to be part of the determination whether or not we wish to go to war, to initiate a war, not to conduct a war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All the time of the Senator from Vermont has expired. The Senator from Wisconsin has 23 minutes and 22 seconds.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, last Thursday, we had two votes which were essentially on this same subject. At that time, the Senate defeated both those amendments. I think we have had adequate time to review the situation here today, but I simply want to say that I am hopeful that the Senate will once again refuse this amendment and go forward without delay to the emergency aid which is needed for El Salvador.

This proposed amendment expresses the widely held belief of the American people that U.S. combat forces should not be involved in the conduct of a Salvadoran war. I believe, and I think most of us believe—all of us believe that U.S. forces should not be involved and the administration has repeatedly stated that it has no intention to introduce U.S. combat forces in El Salvador.

In addition, the War Powers Resolution already requires the President in every possible instance to consult with Congress before introducing U.S. forces into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances, and so on.

The law is on the books. The question before the Senate is not the question of Armed Forces in El Salvador; the question is proceeding with this emergency supplemental appropriation. I am hopeful that the Senate will now proceed without delay on the emergency supplemental appropriation so we can get the agreed-to figure to aid the people in El Salvador as they are working through this very difficult time in their democratic process.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time. I yield back the remainder of my time and yield to the Senator from Tennessee, the majority leader, to make a tabling motion.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, before he does that, may I ask for 2 minutes off the bill? That is all I shall take.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I do not plan to make a tabling motion until we are ready to do it.

I am sorry; I was diverted when the Senator made his statement.

Mr. LEAHY. I asked either the Senator from Hawaii or the Senator from Massachusetts, whoever would have the time, if I could have 2 minutes off the bill—my time is used up on the amendment—before the Senator makes his statement.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am happy to yield for the purpose of making a statement. Is that what the Senator is asking?

Mr. LEAHY. That is it.

Mr. BAKER. Just for that purpose, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, we have probably had a better discussion of this amendment than many others that have come before this body. This is not a hypothetical case. It is not a hypothetical discussion of the War Powers Act. We are dealing with a very real situation. It is specifically pointed at one country. We are in a situation where we face the very real possibility—and many would say probability—of American forces involved in a war in El Salvador.

This amendment does one thing. It is not a question of how much foreign aid we send down there. It simply says, Will we allow American Armed Forces to be involved in a war in El Salvador or not? Whether it is a tabling motion or not, the public ought well to understand this is the time when the Senate, all 100 of us, is called upon to vote whether it is willing to allow American forces to be used in a war in El Salvador or not. That is the issue, plain and simple.

Mr. BAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent on official business.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART) and the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) and the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 59, nays 36, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 51 Leg.]

So the motion to table the amendment (No. 2887) was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, it is my intention to yield the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts so he may offer an amendment.

Mr. President, I yield the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 2843

(Purpose: To delete $21 million for the covert war against Nicaragua)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I call up amendment No. 2843 and ask for its immediate consideration. This is to strike the provision on covert aid to Nicaragua.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) proposes an amendment numbered 2843.

Beginning with line 19 on page 4, delete all through line 2 on page 5.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I understand, there are 4 hours on this amendment, 2 hours to be evenly divided. Am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield such time as I might take.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, today, the U.S. Senate will consider whether we should provide an additional $21 million to fund President Reagan's "secret war" against the Government of Nicaragua. The President is spoiling for a fight against Nicaragua, and Congress should have the courage to stop him now, before his secret war explodes into open conflict engulfing all the nations in the region.

The administration's policy in Nicaragua is illegal and indefensible. The fundamental issue before the Senate is whether the United States should follow the rule of law or the law of the jungle in Central America.

Last week on the floor of the Senate, we learned that the legal basis for the administration's policy is to be found in the Presidential finding of September 20, 1983. According to the administration:

> We are supporting the rebels until the Nicaraguans stop their subversion in neighboring countries . . . there is no thought of . . . backing the insurgents in trying to overthrow the Sandinista government.

We are told that Congress has not authorized support for a program to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua because, and I quote, "To do so would undermine the very legal foundation on which we base the program we have authorized."

I daresay that there are very, very few people in this world who really believe that our aid to the Contras is not being used to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

The President of the United States has stated that the purpose of supporting the Contras is to make the Government of Nicaragua "keep their promise and restore the democratic rule and have elections." But, we are told, "the President has misstated his own policy."

The Contras themselves have made plain that they seek to overthrow the Sandinistas. But, we are told, "what the Nicaraguans fighting the Sandinistas want and what we want are two different things."

That may be so. But the Members of this body certainly know what the Contras are doing. And they are doing precisely what they say they are doing: They are waging war against the Government of Nicaragua for the purpose of overthrowing that government. They are mining harbors; they are overrunning villages; they are holding territory; they are fighting a war for the purpose of conquest. And they are doing all of this with the aid and support of the U.S. Government.

Let us assume that the Sandinistas are in fact still exporting revolution. Let us assume that the Sandinistas are in fact still sending guns and ammunition and war material to the guerrillas in El Salvador. Let us assume that all this is correct, that the government of national reconstruction of Nicaragua has violated article 18 of the Charter of the Organization of American States, which declares that "No state has the right to intervene directly or indirectly for any reason whatsoever in the internal or external affairs of any other state." Does that fact justify a policy by the United States of America that supports the violent overthrow of the Government of Nicaragua?

The legal answer to that question is, "no." The moral answer to that question is, "no." And the political answer to that question is, "no."

Under international law, the United States of America would be entitled to take steps to defend itself and to support its friends against subversion by the Government of Nicaragua. But we have pledged under the charter of the OAS and under the Charter of the United Nations that we would seek a collective judgment on another member country, and that we would use these diplomatic and multilateral legal instruments. We could be entitled to pursue a policy—with our friends in the region—that would interdict the flow of arms and material from Nicaragua to the guerrillas in El Salvador. But that is not what the Contras are doing, and that is not what we are doing when we send military assistance to the Contras.

As the House Intelligence Committee report points out,

> There are certainly a number of ways to interdict arms, but developing a sizable military force and deploying it in Nicaragua is one which strains credibility as an operation only to interdict arms.

Let me quote from a statement issued by five prominent Americans. These individuals have all served in positions of authority in past administrations. These individuals are distinguished public servants and deeply patriotic Americans. They say:

> As former senior Government officials intimately involved with the making of national security policy at the Presidential level, we are opposed to the current American covert operation directed at the Government of Nicaragua. We recognize that the Government of El Salvador has a right to request and receive international support in seeking to end any secret and illegal intervention in its internal affairs by Nicaragua, but any action in support of this right of self-defense should be overt and not covert. We urge the Congress to enact legislation which will bring an end to the covert operation and which will insure that American activities in Central America conform to domestic and international law, are conducted openly, and are aimed at negotiating a political settlement.

This statement was signed by McGeorge Bundy, Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs from 1961 to 1966; by Robert McNamara, Secretary of Defense from 1961 to 1968; by Edmund Muskie, Secretary of State from 1980 to 1981; by Dean Rusk, Secretary of State from 1961 to 1969; and by Cyrus Vance, Secretary of State from 1977 to 1980.

Over 100 law professors have issued a statement opposing U.S. covert intervention in Nicaragua and calling upon the President to "abandon any and all plans for illegal actions to destabilize the Government of Nicaragua." I ask unanimous consent to place this statement into the RECORD with the names of the professors who have endorsed it.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAW PROFESSORS' STATEMENT IN OPPOSITION TO COVERT INTERVENTION IN NICARAGUA

The Reagan Administration's reported plan to covertly destabilize the government of Nicaragua constitutes a serious violation of both international and domestic law.

The Charter of the Organization of American States, a treaty ratified by the United States, prohibits covert destabilization of any O.A.S. member state. Article 15 of the Charter provides:

"No State or group of States has the right to intervene, directly or indirectly, for any reason whatever, in the internal or external affairs of any other State. The foregoing principle prohibits not only armed force but also any other form of interference or attempted threat against the personality of the State or against its political, economic and cultural elements."

Similarly, Article 2(4) of the Charter of the United Nations, a treaty also ratified by the United States, prohibits all United Nations members from using ". . . the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations."

In addition, the United States strongly supported the United Nations Declaration On Principle Of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations And Cooperation Among States (Resolution 2625) which restates the U.N. Charter's prohibition against the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of member states by providing that: "Such a threat or use of force constitutes a violation of international law and shall never be employed as a means of settling international issues."

Since Article VI of the United States Constitution provides that all treaties made under the authority of the United States are the supreme law of the land, the President is duty bound to abide by the specific terms within the Charters of the Organization of American States and the United Nations.

As professors of law, we call upon President Reagan to uphold these principles of international and domestic law and to abandon any and all plans for illegal action to destabilize the government of Nicaragua. In addition, we call upon the Congress to fully investigate the government's reported plan so as to provide for a full and complete debate on this and other U.S. government policy towards Nicaragua. We believe that the American people want our government to pursue policies consistent with international and domestic legal principle.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Presidcnt, if the purpose of our support for the Contras is to interdict arms to El Salvador, that policy has not worked. Despite an expenditure of millions of dollars in American assistance, there is no evidence that any significant volume of supplies has in fact been interdicted. In its May 1983 report, the House Intelligence Committee stated, "in 18 months the committee has not seen any diminishment of arms flow to the Salvadoran guerrillas."

Why has this policy not worked? The answer is plain. Because the Contras have no real interest in interdicting arms, they are not working to interdict arms; they do not pursue any military objectives related to the interdiction of arms; they are about the business of doing something very different; they are about the business of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua.

There is a concept in the law known as willful blindness. The President has been remarkably candid with us as to what he thinks the purpose of our support for the Contras is all about. We could not accuse the President of willful blindness. The Contras have been totally open with us as to what they are trying to accomplish. We could not accuse the Contras of willful blindness.

But if we vote today to support an additional $21 million in assistance to the Contras or the purpose of interdicting supplies, we will be guilty of willful blindness. We know that that is not what they are doing. We know that the Contras are fighting to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. We know that and we vote to give the military assistance anyway. That is willful blindness.

It is also a violation of international law.

It violates article 15 of the charter of the Organization of American States. That provision prohibits direct or indirect intervention in the internal affairs of any member State. It violates article 2(4) of the charter of the United Nations. That provision prohibits the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State. And it violates article VI of the U.S. Constitution. That provision states that all treaties made under the authority of the United States are the supreme law of the land and the President is duty-bound to comply with the terms of those treaties.

Let me quote from a speech given by Daniel Oduber, the former President of Costa Rica, last February 24 at the University of Kentucky:

Supposing that the Nicaraguan Government were overthrown, after thousands of deaths and infinite destruction. What would happen? The defeated groups well-armed and trained would certainly go to the mountains to continue the war as guerrillas. If the rebels of El Salvador could obtain a military victory, as they thought they could in 1980, the defeated Nicaraguan groups, encouraged by neighbors could continue the war endlessly.

War in Central America cannot be won by anybody in spite of what military experts and blind politicians keep saying. Peace is the only way out. And peace has to be built through dialog, admitting pluralism and by letting Central Americans handle their own problems.

The covert operation in Nicaragua is indefensible for many other reasons.

It has been totally counterproductive.

Rather than weakening the Sandinistas inside of Nicaragua, the secret war has consolidated their support among the people.

Rather than isolating Nicaragua from the Soviet Union and Cuba, the secret war has driven Nicaragua to rely more and more on assistance from those nations.

Rather than limiting the conflict in Central America, the secret war has expanded the hostilities which now threaten to widen into Honduras.

Rather than keeping the United States out of war in Central America, the secret war has drawn us deeper and deeper into this new quagmire and it is now clear that U.S. personnel are becoming more and more involved.

Rather than eliminating the influence of the hard-line Marxists within the Nicaraguan Government, the secret war has only strengthened the elements hostile to pluralism and democracy.

Rather than reducing the threat of a Nicaraguan military to its neighbors, the secret war has only produced more and more recruits for the Nicaraguan Army.

Rather than enhancing the reputation of the United States in the world, the secret war has damaged our standing with our allies in Europe and with our friends in Latin America.

Rather than moving the region toward peace, the secret war has undermined the Contadora process and damaged the prospects for a negotiated solution to the problems of the entire region.

This policy is not only wrong legally and morally, it has not only been a failure militarily, it has also done real harm to the fundamental national interests of the United States of America.

The American people do not support this policy, and neither should the U.S. Senate. It is a bankrupt policy, it is a violent policy, it is a failing policy, it is an immoral policy, and it is an illegal policy. It does not merit our support one day longer.

Once again the United States is perceived as intervening militarily in the affairs of our Central American neighbors.

Once again the United States is perceived as supporting the forces of reaction and repression in the region.

Once again the United States is turning to more guns, more bullets, and more war in a flawed and futile attempt to achieve our foreign policy objectives.

The Contras are killing innocent men, women, and children in Nicaragua. And everyone in this Chamber votes more money for that killing will bear a heavy personal responsibility. For some here, the choice may be one of prudent politics or careful calculation; for campesinos in too many villages, it will be literally a life or death decision. Weeks and months from now, they will live or die because of the support we give or withhold today.

Have we not finally learned that the death of peasants is not the way to win a victory for either our principles or our interests?

We are again threatened, as we always are, that if we oppose the rush to a military solution, we will somehow be responsible for losing this country or that one. Over many years, in many different situations, that warning has been heeded; many billions have been spent; many thousands have died—and again and again we have lost. At last and at least let us have the commonsense—and yes, the courage—to try for a peaceful solution before fueling the fires of war; to negotiate with Nicaragua instead of subverting it. And I mean real negotiations, not a subterfuge designed to rubberstamp a turn to armed force.

Some of our colleagues will say that, for reasons of politics as well as policy, we should be cautious in denying the President his request. I reply in the words of Edmund Burke: "A conscientious man would be cautious how he dealt in blood." Today the blood of Nicaraguans is spilled; and tomorrow, it could be the blood of our sons.

So I say to my fellow Senators: Do not cast your vote today for wider war in Nicaragua. Do not cast your vote for more death and destruction. Do not throw away our interests, our principles, our treaties and our chance to stop another senseless and endless war. I ask my colleagues: stand and be counted for peace.

Mr. President, I am glad to yield such time as the Senator from New Jersey may need.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, the question of what should be the U.S. role in Central America is one of the most important issues we will face this decade. How we define and promote our interests in Central America over the next weeks and months could shape the future of our relations with all of Latin America. Certainly, it will permanently influence the security and friendliness of our neighbors to the south. Most important, it could have a lasting effect on the way we view ourselves—the kind of society we are, the values we uphold, the risks we are willing to assume, the foreign and defense policies we pursue.

So I have followed the debate on Central America these past days with intense interest. What surprises—and dismays—me is that for the most part both sides appear to be operating in an historical vacuum. We are debating the U.S. role there as though it were a case of first impression. In fact, we have a long history of involvement in Central America and we ignore its lessons at our peril.

Slighting the historical record of our involvement in Central America leads to serious miscalculations. It inclines us to exaggerate the threat posed by instability in the region, while fostering unrealistic expectations about what we can accomplish. It diverts us from the real threat to our security in the area—Cuba's alinement with the Soviet Union—while blinding us to opportunities for promoting our long term interests. And it traps us in a course of action that, if pursued to its logical conclusion, will not only inflict even greater suffering on the Central American people but could tear our own society apart.

We urgently need a new policy toward Central America—a policy that is balanced, pragmatic and sustainable. Above all, we need a policy that reflects the lessons of our history there. Only then can we hope to avoid the mistakes that have frustrated past efforts at encouraging a measure of stability and progress in this troubled region.

What is the history of our involvement in Central America and what light can it shed on the present? Let me begin with an anecdote recounted by Walter Lafeber in a recent collection of essays entitled Central America: Anatomy of Conflict. In 1906, senior U.S. military officials asked President Roosevelt to authorize our diplomats and naval commanders in Central America to stop revolts and permanently stabilize the region. The request reached the desk of an Assistant Secretary of State, Alvey Adee, who wrote in the document's margin: "How could we do this without acquiring all these little countries?" The President must have agreed with Adee's assessment for the request promptly died.

Adee's question is as valid today as it as in 1906. It alerts us to something we all too frequently forget: namely, that a successful strategy cannot ignore the crucial link between one's ends and one's means. In other words, strategy can never be divorced from the costs of implementing it. Unsuccessful strategies often fail precisely because they ignore this link. If our objective truly is to stamp out revolution in the Central American States, then we must be prepared to occupy and colonize them. This is what the Soviet Union did successfully in Georgia and Uzbekistan and is trying to do in Afghanistan. If we are unwilling to incur these costs—and I think we should be unwilling—then we must modify our objective otherwise our strategy is doomed to almost certain failure.

What it boils down to is a choice: either we restrict our interests to bring them in line with available resources; or we expand our resources to bring them in line with our proclaimed interests. The history of our involvement in Central America painfully documents the consequences of neglecting this choice.

For although President Roosevelt was unwilling to acquire these little countries, he nonetheless publicly vowed to act as an international police power to end the chronic uprising in the Caribbean and Central American nations. The United States has pursued this policy ever since. We landed troops in Central America to suppress rebellions, protect U.S. economic interests, or prop up conservative regimes some 20 times between 1898 and 1920 alone. In 1912, President Taft sent 2,600 marines into Nicaragua and left them there for 13 years. Revolution broke out less than 4 weeks after their departure and 5,400 troops returned in 1927, remaining there until 1933. The rationale for these deployments was to smash revolution least it spread to neighboring states and, having smashed it, to maintain the peace and oversee elections.

Predictably, the marines became increasingly unpopular in Central America. Thus we began training national guards whom we placed under friendly officers as a substitute for U.S. troops. Nicaraguan Dictator Anastasio Somoza used the U.S.-trained national guard to vault himself into the Presidency and to establish a military regime that endured until the Sandinista revolution brought it to a violent close some 40 years later.

After World War II, U.S. aid to these local military forces increased. We furnished them with funds and training at North American bases. During the fifties and sixties, the CIA schooled U.S.-trained officers in sophisticated counterinsurgency techniques. And under President Nixon, our aid grew to an alltime high.

Of course, military assistance was not all we provided. Its ostensible purpose was to act as a shield while we helped direct Central America's economic development and got elections going—just as we are proposing to do today.

This policy of using military assistance as a shield for economic and social reform simply has not worked. In large part, its failure is due to the fact that economic development and social progress have taken second place to security considerations. There is no reason to expect a different outcome today. Yet we continue to reject the main lesson of our Central American experience; namely, that no amount of U.S. aid can improve economic and social conditions enough to dampen revolution unless and until governments come to power that are committed to, and capable of implementing, genuine reform.

A policy of supporting the traditional civilian elites and their military cohorts who have dominated Central America for decades will not end revolution. We can no longer afford to indulge the illusion that it will. The reality is that revolutionary movements have proliferated notwithstanding—I would argue in large part because of—growing U.S. assistance to conservative military regimes. Our military interventions have polarized the countries in which they occurred and radicalized the groups advocating fundamental reform. Our policy has thus produced the opposite of its intended result. We have nurtured revolution, not quashed it. There is no basis for believing that we will be more successful now.

If the traditional mix of military and economic assistance does not serve U.S. objectives in Central America what will? Developing a more effective strategy requires a better alinement of ends and means. What are our strategic interests in the region? Is it as vital as the advocates of a bigger and bigger military role proclaim?

Central America is not unimportant to us if for no other reason than its geographical proximity. Our vital strategic interest in the region is in preventing Cuba and the Soviet Union from engaging in activities that would genuinely menace U.S. security and the security of friends and allies, or that would have a potentially critical effect on the global strategic balance.

If we are serious about preventing this from happening, it is essential that we avoid threat-mongering. Above all, we must not sell ourselves short by discounting existing American strength and capability in the region. Unfortunately, we have done both of these things in the past and are all too likely to continue doing them if we pursue our present course.

The proponents of increased military aid argue that we must resist any revolutionary advance in Central America lest it force us to greatly boost our defense spending or cut back on commitments elsewhere in the world. They maintain that a victory by revolutionaries anywhere in Central America would increase the cost and difficulty of defending the Caribbean sea lanes; threaten our wartime access to the Panama Canal; and undermine our credibility by giving the Soviets a triumph in our strategic rear.

However plausible these assertions may at first appear, they do not withstand careful analysis. The fact is that our security interests in Central America, while important, are both more limited and more manageable than is generally acknowledged.

Why do I say this? First, because the real threat in the region already is, and is likely to remain, Cuba. Cuba is a problem we have to deal with. But revolutionary governments in Nicaragua and other Central American countries individually need not seriously aggravate the existing Cuban threat nor materially enhance Soviet capabilities in the region. The United States already enjoys an enormous strategic advantage in the area. This advantage derives in part from our large continental-based air forces and large fleets in the Atlantic and Pacific. Their size and proximity to Central America and the Caribbean give us potentially overwhelming power relative to any few forces the Soviets could base or deploy there.

Nor are the Caribbean sealanes as strategically important as some contend. The reality is that Cuba already has the potential to interdict NATO supplies and reinforcements passing through the Caribbean. But it is essential to understand that Cuba's interdiction capability is not the binding constraint on our ability to wage protracted war in Europe. The effective limit on that ability is the following: Our own and our allies' reserves of ammunition and spare parts are simply insufficient to sustain high intensity combat in Europe or Asia for more than a few weeks. The unvarnished truth is that the war would be over before the safe passage of supplies and reinforcements became an issue. That is a disturbing comment on America's military readiness and represents a much more serious threat to our security than insurgency in Central America.

The assertion that guerrilla victories would pose a new strategic threat to our access to the Panama Canal is similarly misleading. The fact is that saboteurs from Cuba or other countries can already threaten our access to the canal. Since we cannot afford to count on access now, it is simply an exaggeration to say that a guerrilla victory in El Salvador or consolidation of Sandinista power in Nicaragua would pose a new strategic danger.

On the other hand, advocates of an open ended military solution in Central America are right to worry about losing our capability to act globally if we get bogged down in the region. But the source of that danger is less the threats posed by revolutionary movements than our own susceptibility to strategic diversion from real threats to our security elsewhere in the world. If we do get bogged down, it wil be because of a serious miscalculation on our part. It will be because of a failure of strategy. We cannot afford to let that occur.

As I said earlier, I see the threat in Central America as more limited, more manageable, and less pervasive than either the President's Bipartisan Commission on Central America or the administration. At the same time, I do not discount the possibility that Cuba or the U.S.S.R. would engage in activities in the region that we should treat as genuinely menacing. We need to counter that possibility with the most pragmatic, lowest-cost strategy available for preserving our overwhelmingly dominant position in the region and deterring the Soviets from any truly threatening activies here. We need to enhance our existing power projection capabilities by increasing our flexibility and our readiness to act effectively in the event of a genuine threat to our security.

This means that we must be willing and able to make it absolutely clear to Cuba and the U.S.S.R. that we will not tolerate any new offensive fortifications and deployments that would seriously threaten America's interests in the region or to tip the strategic balance in the Soviets' favor.

Beyond making it clear to any potential adversary where we draw the line in Central America, we must also understand that our most pressing mission in the region is insuring Cuba's nonbelligerency in the event of a European or Asian conflict. If we plan now, the requirements for this mission can be satisfied largely with existing forces and facilities. Moreover, by delineating the mission and designating the forces in advance of hostilities, we improve our ability to deter Cuba from acting belligerently in the first place and to respond swiftly and effectively should deterrence fail.

Finally, and perhaps most important, we must put the Central American problem in perspective. It is not the crisis that the Bipartisan Commission and the administration are fond of calling it. The situation is chronic, endemic, and requires a sustainable, long-term strategy that recognizes this reality. Characterizing it as a crisis only invites the strategic diversion the administration fears. Rather than avoiding this danger, the administration appears to have embraced it.

Once we have a framework for dealing with the main threats to our vital strategic interest we can decide on a course of action toward individual Central American states that is less ideological than our present policy and much more sensitive to the realities on the ground.

In the case of El Salvador, this means recognizing that the levels of military assistance the American people will support may enable the Salvadoran Government to avoid defeat by the guerrillas; but it will not be enough to enable them to win the war. While the Salvadoran military may face some shortages of equipment, their real problems are much more fundamental: Ineffective leadership and inadequate motivation. No amount of U.S. assistance can offset these crucial failings. Thus, reform of the security forces is not merely a political or moral necessity but a military imperative. The military's violence and corruption is standing between it and victory over the insurgents. The reason is that an effective counter-insurgency effort requires the support and cooperation of the Salvadoran people.

No amount of American aid can substitute for that popular support. Yet the people will not cooperate with a government that does not represent and defend their interests, protect their physical security or give them some economic stake in the society. In my judgment none of these things will occur in the absence of fairly profound political change. I will support providing some $61 million in emergency aid to El Salvador because I believe we owe it to the Salvadoran Government to see them through the elections. We should also give Mr. Duarte, should he win, the opportunity to make good on his recent promises to open dialog with all sectors of Salvadoran society and to make needed changes in the military.

I also believe that Congress would be right in conditioning any increase in military aid on the successful control of the death squads, the protection of human rights, the achievement of other essential economic and military reforms, and the willingness to pursue a negotiated settlement. And Congress should enforce those conditions much more stringently than we have in the past. I will cast my vote on military aid in accordance with this view.

In the case of Honduras, we must recognize that whatever the merits of using U.S. forces in a campaign to coerce Nicaragua, a permanent uniformed combat presence there is both unnecessary and needlessly provocative. In the first place, using Honduras as a base to destabilize Nicaragua risks destabilizing Honduras. Second, by involving Honduras in our "secret" war against the Sandinistas, we endanger Honduras' own security.

The possibility of a regional war is higher than it has been in decades, particularly between two states whose conflict is rooted in historical grievances. When war is imminent, the military's hand is strengthened against the popularly elected civilian leadership. This, in turn, threatens the survival of democracy and fuels traditional fears that the United States is once again supporting the establishment of a military dynasty.

Finally, by militarizing our presence in Honduras, we jeopardize the effectiveness of our civilian efforts to improve economic and social conditions and bolster the democratic government. Given that our proclaimed interest in the region is peace and democracy, this outcome would be perverse in the extreme.

In addition to changing our policies toward Honduras and El Salvador, we must recognize the inherent limitations of unilateral action to bring stability to Central America. We need the cooperation and good will of the democracies in the region like Venezuela, Panama, Colombia, and especially Mexico. They are indispensible to a viable strategy for containing Soviet-Cuban expansion. We clearly need their support if we are serious about a credible and sustainable commitment to economic and social progress in the region. As a Mexican friend said to me recently, America's two biggest challenges are its relations with the Soviet Union and with Mexico. A better relationship with Mexico must be at the top of our national agenda.

Since war or revolution in Central America could pose serious problems for Mexico's security, Mexican and U.S. aims in the region coincide. Like the United States, the Mexican Government has an interest in limiting Soviet and Cuban penetration of Central America.

But we should have learned by now that we cannot dictate to the Mexicans and, by pursuing policies and actions in the region that confuse and alarm Mexico, we are only playing into Soviet hands. While the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua appears to be no friend of ours, a strongly anti-American regime in Mexico would be a far greater threat. In countering Sandinista excesses, we must guard against precipitating a nationalist anti-American lurch in Mexico, which could be felt in everything from immigration to international debt. For example, during the recent financial crisis in Argentina, Mexico asserted leadership which was constructive and pro-American. In fact, if the leadership took Latin America into a debtors' cartel our interests could be more fundamentally threatened than ever possible by guerrillas in El Salvador or Sandinistas in Nicaragua. The question is whether Mexico believes that in the United States it has a friend who shares a common vision for the region or whether our military adventurism will drive Mexico to the conclusion that our interests conflict fundamentally.

The best way to avoid anti-Americanism in Mexico while securing an end to the present conflict is to actively promote a regional agreement for withdrawing all foreign forces and advisers; stopping all cross-border support for guerrilla groups; limiting the size of armies and the nature of armaments so one nation cannot threaten another; reducing Soviet and Cuban influence, particularly in Nicaragua; and encouraging the emergence of participatory political systems that provide for the well-being of the people and respect their rights. A negotiating framework, the so-called Contadora process, is already in place. We should back it to the hilt.

A good faith commitment to the Contadora group precludes unilateral U.S. actions that would undermine its work. Thus, we cannot continue to fund the "secret" war in Nicaragua and simultaneously support a negotiated regional settlement. But there are other reasons for cutting off funds to the rebel army. First, administration supporters of the Contras have not demonstrated that they are capable of a military victory against the much better trained and equipped Sandinista forces. Nor has the administration explained how, even assuming a military victory, the Contras would be able to compete politically with the Sandinistas or how they would translate such a victory into sustained popular support.

Indeed, it apparently has been concluded that there are no conditions under which the U.S. backed rebels can achieve a military or political victory. Under these circumstances, continuing covert aid can only further destabilize the region and raise serious doubts about U.S. motives and objectives in Latin America.

Finally, while the ostensible purpose of the secret war in Nicaragua is arms interdiction, the administration has yet to point to any evidence that it has achieved this aim. It is time to look to diplomatic options. I shall, therefore, support the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts and oppose covert aid to the Contras.

There are, of course, risks in pursuing a negotiated settlement. The point is that the present policy does not protect our interest in Central America. Rather, it endangers those interests and carries us toward an even more threatening situation that may culminate in a regional explosion and drag us willy-nilly into war.

In the final analysis, Mr. President, the key to our Central American dilemma is whether we are smart enough, wise enough, sensitive enough, strong enough, and patient enough to join with our Latin American neighbors in forging a common strategy against outside intervention; in encouraging democratic reforms in the region; and in building a better life for its citizens.

Central and South American nations have longstanding aspirations for nonintervention and self-determination. The big question for the future of Central America and the future of U.S. relations with all of Latin America is whether we can find appropriate and convincing ways to support those aspirations at the same time both North and South Americans strive to overcome the mistakes and illusions of the past.

If we meet this challenge, Mr. President we shall find that we have our own security firmly in hand and that we can live quite comfortably with a wide range of political opinion south of the border. If instead, we persist in our present course, we may well find ourselves once again bogged down in a quagmire, to the satisfaction of our adversaries, the consternation of our allies, and the despair of our own people.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise to comment briefly on the question of U.S. covert assistance to those called Contras who are dedicated to the overthrow of the ruling Sandinista regime in Nicaragua.

For well over 2 years, the U.S. Government has been arming and advising the Contras. The administration justifies its involvement by saying that action is necessary to prevent the flow of arms from Nicaragua to left-leaning extremists in El Salvador and other nonalined states in the region.

So we give guns, ammunition, and advice to the opponents of Nicaragua's rulers. These rebels undoubtedly agree that antigovernment military and paramilitary activity will disrupt arms leaving Nicaragua for other Central American destinations. But, is that disruption the prime objective of the men and women who wield those U.S.-supplied weapons? No. Their objective is singular: to topple the Sandinista regime.

We give the covert aid for one reason; the Contras take it for another. Oil terminals are bombed. Harbors are mined. Transportation links are targeted. Factories, depots, and communications facilities critical to the Nicaraguan economy are sabotaged in much the same way that those labeled "Middle East terrorists" by our own Government sabotage facilities and public buildings. What is the difference?

Do we not run a serious risk of becoming, in the eyes of the world community, the West's Libya? Do we care nothing about our credibility? Despite our motive, U.S. guns and other equipment are being used to terrorize and to undermine the government of an independent, sovereign, state.

As long as this assistance program continues, U.S. credibility will erode. If our Government is ever to be taken seriously when it speaks out and calls for concerted action against terrorism, the covert assistance program to the Contras must cease.

Commonsense tells us that it must cease. International law requires that it cease.

Instead of bullying Nicaragua into submission, the U.S. financing of the rebels is having the opposite effect. Nicaragua is stepping up its military program and rallying its people in the process. We are the external threat which may unify the Nicaraguans solidly behind the Sandinistas. By the time free and fair elections are available to the Nicaraguan people, the situation may be so unnerving to them that they may, of their own free will, decide to support those who are determined to stand up to the belligerent colossus to the North.

Mr. President, last July former Secretary of State Muskie joined with four other eminent Americans—Robert McNamara, McGeorge Bundy, Dean Rusk, and Cyrus Vance—in offering a concise, straightforward statement of opposition to the current U.S. policy toward Nicaragua. They stated:

> We are opposed to the current American covert operation directed at the Government of Nicaragua. We recognize that the Government of El Salvador has a right to request and receive international support in seeking to end any secret and illegal intervention in its internal affairs by Nicaragua, but any action in support of this right of self-defense should be overt and not covert. We urge the Congress to enact legislation which will insure that American activities in Central America conform to domestic and international law, are conducted openly, and are aimed at negotiating a political settlement.

Secretary Muskie and his colleagues were correct in July and their position is sound today. We should follow this thoughtful advice. Let us oppose covert action in this instance for it violates international law, violates American law, and is contrary to the values which we Americans profess to embrace.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am voting for this amendment because I am concerned that our aid for covert actions in Nicaragua has the effect of being directed at overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua in violation of the Congress legislative statement in 1982 that this should not be an objective of U.S. aid.

I have urged Secretary Shultz to take advantage of the processes of the Contadora group to enter into serious negotiations with the Government of Nicaragua. Efforts to overthrow that Government in my judgment, are contrary to a long-range solution to the problems in that area.

It is not enough to say we will deal with this issue at a later date; the time for decision is now.

It is not enough to say our intent is not to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government when we know those we aid do intend to overthrow.

It is not enough to say the Contras' intent is not important because they do not have the capacity to overthrow the Government when they are attempting to do just that and we are helping them.

It is not enough to say this is just a Central America issue; the recent mining of harbors in Nicaragua involves other countries and presents a far more ominous threat which must be addressed now.

I have supported the President's requests for aid to El Salvador where we are aiding the establishment of a democratic government. While the current aid for the Contras in Nicaragua may be said to be ultimately aimed at stopping the flow of arms to El Salvador, the means do not justify the ends; and we should not use our foreign aid to harass or overthrow the existing Government in Nicaragua.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I have repeatedly spoken in the past of my opposition to a policy of targeted, active subversion of the Government of Nicaragua by the United States. Additionally, I have spoken clearly of my own political critique of that regime. Lastly, I have made clear that the evidence for Nicaragua's active policy of arms exports to allied military units in neighboring nations is clear and must be stopped.

If the present amendment were more exactingly targeted toward assuring that active overthrow of Nicaragua by the United States would not be carried out, this measure might receive greater support. Unfortunately, as is the case with other amendments to this bill, the proponents of the amendment have created a dilemma for those in this Senate who are concerned that our attacks on Nicaragua as subversive of its neighbors can easily be turned back on the United States.

However, the evidence of Nicaraguan action in daily, weekly, and monthly covert arms smuggling into neighboring countries is overwhelmingly clear and suggests a strategy of Nicaraguan involvement in military action outside its borders—a condition I find deeply disturbing and threatening to those weakened nations which are attempting to develop democratic institutions. Thus, I must oppose this amendment because it would halt even the efforts to interdict weapons being transferred from Nicaragua to other countries for the purpose of supporting subversion of our close allies.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator from Arizona may desire.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate on this amendment, particularly to the remarks of my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY). During the course of his discussion, he made a statement that this program is illegal.

Mr. President, there has been a good deal of discussion as to whether the covert paramilitary operation directed against the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua is a legal activity. In fact, many Members of the House of Representatives have stated publicly that this covert action program is illegal—that it violates the so-called Boland amendment, or it violates the U.N. Charter or the charter of the Organization of American States. Mr. President, I do not believe this is quite right.

I do not think that anyone questions the President's legal authority to conduct covert action. Under the provisions of 22 United States Code 2422, Presidential findings constitute both the legal authority and the policy framework for covert action programs. These programs are routinely briefed to the House and Senate Intelligence Committees which, in turn, report authorization legislation to fund them. Occasionally, covert action proposals are not authorized by the Congress, and funds are withheld accordingly.

Let me summarize several points on the issue of the legality of this covert action as follows:

Every State, Mr. President, has the right under international law to defend itself against attempts by another State to assist insurgent groups in its territory, and furthermore, has the right to seek and receive support from friendly countries in doing so.

The right of individual and collective self-defense is specifically recognized by the U.N. Charter and the Rio Treaty. Each American State has a duty under the Rio Treaty and the OAS Charter to assist other American States in defending themselves against aggression.

This principle of international law clearly applies to what is happening in Central America. The governments of Cuba and Nicaragua have been engaging in a serious and sustained effort to overthrow the Government of El Salvador through the direction, support and infiltration of arms to insurgents in that country. Much of this infiltration has violated the territory and sovereignty of Honduras as well. All of this clearly amounts to an armed attack under international law.

El Salvador and Honduras have a clear right to defend themselves against this armed attack, and the United States has a clear right to assist them in collective self-defense.

Mr. President, I believe that most Members of the Senate will be satisfied that the intelligence community is living up to its obligations under the law. The Secretary of State and our Ambassador to the United Nations have said, "The U.S. Government is not breaking the law." I concur with this point of view in the context of the covert action program in Nicaragua.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator yield on the point of legality?

I have put into the record a list of the law professors from many of our most distinguished law schools all over this country who believe that this is a violation of international law. I wonder whether the Senator from Arizona had a similar brief from those lawyers who sustain the position of the Senator from Arizona that this is a legal action? I wonder if those who support the covert action have been able to fashion or shape any body of legal opinion within this country that would state, on the basis of law, that this is a justifiable action, leaving aside the question of policy?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I say to my friend from Massachusetts, we had the opinions of the State Department, of the intelligence family, and of members of our staff and others who have studied it. We feel, after long discussion, that we are operating within the law.

Now, I have no doubt that we can find people who agree with the Senator from Massachusetts; we can find lawyers on all sides of the fence.

Mr. KENNEDY. The reason I ask the question is that I think once——

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will wait 1 minute, I will be glad to put in the RECORD in the next day or two a list of the legal authorities that we have on our side. I think that will answer the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would appreciate that, because the references the Senator has cited represent those who have supported the administration's policy. There are outside, independent, legal experts who feel it does violate international law, including some distinguished lawyers from the Senator's own State, for instance, Andrew Silverman, professor of law, University of Arizona College of Law. And there a number of others who I would think could be considered to be virtually independent of a policy position on this and yet have questioned the legality. I know we will debate the policy consideration, but on the question of legality I was interested in what independent authority the Senator has. I will wait to see what he provides.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will be very glad, Mr. President, to supply a list of authorities that participated in our formulation of this position. We discussed this and debated it in the Intelligence Committee at some length. In fact, we have been on this problem for a little over 3 years.

Now, Mr. President, on another subject, a statement was made that the purpose is to overthrow the Sandinista Government.

It seems to me that the crux of this debate involves whether or not the U.S. Government is trying to overthrow the Marxist military regime in Managua, Nicaragua. Most of my Colleagues will remember that when the Sandinista forces took control in Nicaragua in 1979, they enjoyed the support of almost all political groups in their country. They had a force of over 15,000 well-armed and trained guerrillas. Both the Carter administration and Castro's Cuba supported the ouster of President Somoza, who eventually fled with his palace guard to an estate in Florida. Later, he was murdered by a Sandinista death squad in Paraguay.

Since 1979, the Marxist Sandinista Government in Nicaragua has developed the largest military force in Central America. They have improved a dozen of their existing bases, and have constructed almost 40 new military bases. They have built up a regular military force of over 20,000 troops, with reserves of over 20,000 and a militia of over 30,000. With this force, the Nicaraguans can field over 90 infantry battalions of varied combat efficiency.

Obviously, Cuba has played an important role in the success of Nicaragua's militarization program. Their military forces are patterned after Cuba's. Thousands of Cubans serve in a variety of roles in Nicaragua. Substantial amounts of Soviet military supplies flow into Nicaragua every day by way of Cuba and the Soviet Union.

Now, Mr. President, do any of my colleagues seriously believe that this Marxist military machine is going to be brought to its knees by several thousand Nicaraguan and Moskito Indian freedom fighters? I believe that the Soviet-supported Sandinista Government is fully capable of defending itself from anti-Sandinista insurgents operating out of the territory of any of its neighbors. Furthermore, Nicaragua is capable of launching strikes against El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica. After all, El Salvador is in the throes of a Nicaraguan-supported insurgency, Costa Rica maintains no standing army at all, and Honduras is left pretty much alone against the largest military force in Central America.

Mr. President, I will not labor the point. Winston Churchill once said, "you cannot argue against arithmetic." The arithmetic in Central America simply does not support the thesis that a relatively small band of anti-Sandinistas is going to overthrow the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua. Unfortunately, Mr. President, the odds all seem to favor Nicaragua's Marxist military machine doing all the overthrowing, now and into the future. So let us not be deceived into worrying about whether there is any purpose or intention to overthrow the Marxist government in Nicaragua when there is no apparent capability to do so.

COMMITTEE ACTION ON CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. President, because this debate will eventually get into committee action, I want to summarize briefly the committee actions we have taken on this program.

Ever since President Carter signed the first Presidential Finding on Nicaragua, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence has engaged in effective oversight of covert action directed against the Sandinista regime of Nicaragua. Although all Members of this body have full access to all documents pertaining to this oversight under the provisions of Senate Resolution 400, it may be useful to review some of our oversight activities on this program over the past year.

On May 6, 1983, the Intelligence Committee voted 13 to 2 to authorize and fund a covert paramilitary action program directed against the Sandinista regime subject to certain conditions stipulated by the committee. The committee placed all funds requested by the President for fiscal year 1984 into the reserve for contingencies for the purpose of supporting a redirected, redefined covert paramilitary action program based upon formulation of a new Presidential finding.

I inform my colleagues that later, either today or tomorrow, the majority leader will read a letter on that subject from the President of the United States.

Some of my colleagues may recall that at the time we asked the President to come up with a new program on the whole of Central America before September 30, 1983.

The committee subsequently met on September 20, 1983, to consider the new Presidential Finding on Nicaragua. Witnesses at the hearing included Secretary of State Shultz, the Director of Central Intelligence, Casey, and the Assistant Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The committee met again on September 21; and, after careful consideration, the committee agreed overwhelmingly to approve the covert paramilitary action program for Nicaragua. Our vote was bipartisan in nature with only two dissenting votes cast.

On November 3, 1983, the Senate passed unanimously the Intelligence Authorization Act for fiscal year 1984. Among other things, this legislation authorized funds for the covert paramilitary action program in Nicaragua. Subsequently, there was a joint House/Senate conference on this legislation. House and Senate conferees agreed that $24 million would be made available in fiscal year 1984 to fund the covert paramilitary action program in Nicaragua. This figure of $24 million was a cap, and it was agreed that any further funding for this program would have to come in the form of a supplemental request approved by both Houses of Congress.

On March 8, 1984, Secretary of State Shultz and Director Casey appeared before the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence to discuss this program. Unfortunately, the agenda of that meeting changed dramatically when we learned that the administration was attempting what appeared to be an end run of the authorizing committees. Secretary of State Shultz testified that what had happened was a mistake and he apologized to us for it. I, for one, believe him and do not blame him for what happened.

On March 13, 1984, the full committee met again to consider this matter. At that session, we voted unanimously to raise the ceiling of moneys authorized for this program by $21 million. The day following our meeting, the Senate Apporpriations Committee also agreed to raise this ceiling by $21 million. That vote was unanimous as well, I am told.

Mr. President, my point in recounting this background is to emphasize the importance which the committee places on carefully evaluating this program and its role in the President's foreign policy for Central America. Our committee has worked long and hard on this issue. At the same time, and with only a few exceptions, I believe the administration has made a good faith effort to accommodate our interests.

It is my sincere hope that this spirit of bipartisanship can continue as we act on the urgent supplemental appropriations bill here today. I also hope this spirit of bipartisanship and cooperation will continue as we move into our conference with the House on this important issue.

Mr. CRANSTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time to the Senator from California?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield such time as the Senator needs.

AGAINST TERRORISM IN CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, we have never known modern war upon our continent in the United States. But it is coming closer and closer.

Soviet submarines carrying nuclear missiles are moving closer to our shores, and we are moving missiles in Europe closer to the U.S.S.R.

We are involved—directly and indirectly—in hostilities that lie down the Pan American Highway in Central America. You could get in your car and drive to the war raging there. California is about as close to Nicaragua as it is to Washington, D.C.

Americans have already died in hostilities in Grenada, El Salvador, Honduras, and on the border of Nicaragua. We are getting in deeper and deeper—and the worst of our actions are those aimed at Nicaragua.

Ronald Reagan has justified administration policy initiatives in Lebanon, Grenada, and elsewhere as key to American efforts to combat international terrorism. Secretary Shultz denounced state terrorism, but the Reagan administration is supporting international terrorism in Nicaragua.

The Reagan administration is bankrolling a mixed group of thugs, mercenaries, freedom fighters, former Somocistas, and disaffected Sandinistas who are trying to terrorize the Nicaraguan people into taking up arms against the Sandinista regime. American taxpayers' dollars are helping to perform such missions as the bombing of commercial oil facilities, the bombing of the civilian airport in the Nicaraguan Capital, Managua, and the mining of Nicaraguan harbors on both the Atlantic and Pacific seaboard.

We are involved in activities directed at overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua, coming at Nicaragua from the east, the west, the north, and the south: from the east, the mining of harbors in the Atlantic; from the west, the mining of harbors in the Pacific; from the north, from Honduras; from the south, from Costa Rica.

Through its funding of counterrevolutionaries, the U.S. Government is systematically intervening in the internal affairs of Nicaragua and is clearly violating the charter of the Organization of American States, which the United States led the way in drafting.

The Reagan administration has made clumsy efforts to keep its clumsy covert war a secret in order to stifle domestic opposition in the United States. But there is sufficient evidence in the public domain to demonstrate that the Reagan policies on Nicaragua are immoral, ill conceived, and in direct contravention of international law. The only good reason left for the Reagan administration's insistence that the covert operations should remain classified is to bar informed debate in the United States. President Reagan so much as conceded this last fact in his press conference on October 29 of last year when he remarked, in reference to the secret Nicaraguan war, that "while your people may have a right to know, you can't let your people know without letting the wrong people know—those who are in opposition to what you are doing."

Think about this astounding statement for a moment. President Reagan is declaring that the American people may or may not have the right to know how tax dollars are being spent in support of his secret, undeclared war against Nicaragua. And his argument for secrecy is not based upon military necessity. The Nicaraguans are acutely aware that CIA-backed groups are blowing up domestic targets—the perpetrators are issuing press releases crowing about their brave deeds. President Reagan's argument for secrecy is that he wants to avoid letting the wrong people know—those who are in opposition to what you are doing.

One can make the moral case against the Reagan administration war against the Sandinistas—that U.S. funding of mercenaries terrorizing civilians and destroying commercial targets is unworthy of our Nation's fundamental principles.

One can make the legal case that the United States should not brazenly violate any international treaty, especially one as important as the OAS charter.

One can make the geopolitical argument that it weakens the U.S. case abroad for us to be involved in covert gunrunning, secret undeclared wars, and terrorism.

But for those who are so shortsighted as to believe that legality and morality have little to do with policy and who care only about whether the effort immediately at hand will weaken Nicaraguans' support for the pro-Soviet Sandinista junta, there is a compelling practical case against the secret war as well.

The original, stated objective of this secret war was to interdict arms traffic to Salvadoran guerrillas, allegedly sponsored by the Sandinistas. But the Reagan administration has not produced convincing evidence that this alleged arms flow continues. Indeed the administration has conceded that up to 50 percent of the Salvadoran rebels' guns are captured from the U.S.-backed Salvadoran Army. So the administration now asserts that the objective of the CIA-backed Contras is to weaken popular support for the Sandinistas in Nicaragua and force them to reform their Government.

But the practical effect of the U.S.-backed covert war is exactly the opposite. Reagan administration backing of the hated remnants of Somoza's National Guard daily consolidates nationalist support for the Sandinistas. Administration policy is used to justify the Sandinistas' otherwise unjustifiable military buildup. And it undermines efforts of democratic opponents to focus attention on the Sandinistas' betrayal of pledges for a free press and free elections.

Last year, I visited the leaders of Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama, four key democratic allies of the United States who are providing regional leadership for Central America peacemaking efforts.

These pro-American leaders are unanimous in their opposition to the covert war, which they view as counterproductive in every sense of the word.

So, too, is the majority of the U.S. Congress. Congress has adopted legislation prohibiting the expenditure of any moneys by the Pentagon or the CIA "for the purpose of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua." But the Reagan administration has in fact expanded its illegal efforts and sent forth State Department lawyers to explain that while recipients of U.S. funds are publicly committed to the military overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government, our U.S. aid is not explicitly intended for this purpose.

This type of legalistic doubletalk is not worthy of an American President; 20 years ago, that wise commentator, Walter Lippmann, saw the perils of such policies in Latin America:

> A policy is bound to fail, which deliberately violates our pledges and our principles, our treaties and our laws. In the great struggle with communism, we must find our strength by developing and applying our own principles, not in abandoning them.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am glad to yield such time as the principal cosponsor, Senator BINGAMAN, so desires.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, I discussed this issue at some length last Thursday, but I wish to take the occasion of this debate this evening to once again make a few points that I think are important concerning our support for the so-called Contras who are fighting against the Sandinista government.

First, let me make the point that I believe this is a crucial issue because I believe that our support for the Contras is the largest single mistake that we are making in our Central American policy today. It is a mistake that can be cured by Congress, by cutting off funds. It is a mistake that the people of this country, I believe, would like to see cured, and I feel very strongly that terminating our support for this activity would go a long way to reduce the tension in that region and begin to put us on a path of a negotiated resolution of the differences that exists there.

Let me say that as to the argument about whether or not we, the people of this great country, are trying to overthrow the Sandinista government by our support for the Contras, I see that argument as a red herring. The truth of the issue has to be determined by what these guerrillas are engaged in. If you look at the nature of the activity that they are engaged in and that we read about in the morning newspaper, every day or two, and we see in the morning news and on the evening news on television, it is very, very difficult to make a credible argument that we are not supporting people engaged in trying to overthrow the Sandinista government.

There are a great many guerrillas today. The number has increased very significantly in recent months. Their only source of support is the United States, and it is clear from press reports that they are engaged in systematic attacks on the infrastructure of Nicaragua. They are engaged in attacks on the roads, on bridges, on powerlines. They are mining harbors. They are doing all that is possible to disrupt the coffee harvest and other agricultural activities that that country depends heavily upon for foreign exchange.

They are engaged in military efforts, according to the newspapers, to secure land areas within Nicaragua from which they can, in their view, expand their base of support.

It is clear to me that for us to argue we are not engaged in trying to overthrow the Sandinistas is the height of hypocrisy, when those people we are supplying and arming are quite up front and willing to admit that that is their key goal and their ultimate objective, whether it is ours or not.

The supporters of the administration policy with regard to the Contra activity make a series of arguments, none of which in my view add up to a logical reason to support the Contras. They cite the tremendous buildup in military capability by the Nicaraguans and a good argument can be made that the Nicaraguans have increased their military capability significantly in recent years.

They, of course, in Nicaragua would argue that has been necessary to counter the buildup by their neighbors and to meet the threat that they have encountered from Contra activity and other activity that this country has supported financially and otherwise.

But there is a military buildup in Nicaragua. There is a military buildup throughout Central America. The truth is we are engaged in an arms race in Central America and the United States is one of the main participants in that arms race.

Another argument that the supporters of administration policy make with regard to the Contras is that the Nicaraguans themselves are receiving outside support from Cuba and from the Soviet Union, and clearly the Nicaraguans are receiving outside support from those sources and that is a major cause for concern in this country. Again it is not a logical reason for us to support Contra activity in my view.

Another argument that is made is that the Nicaraguan Government today, the Sandinistas, are in some sense illegal in that they did not come to power through the normal democratic processes, but I point out that same argument can be made about many of the governments in that region of the world. It is an unfortunate fact, but it is somewhat hypocritical for us to apply a standard in the case of Nicaragua that we are not willing to apply in the case of those countries that we find more accommodating to our view of what should be done.

Clearly it seems to me that these are not reasons to support the Contras. These may be reasons to break off diplomatic relations with Nicaragua. These may be reasons to impose economic sanctions against Nicaragua. They may be reasons to even take military action against Nicaragua in the view of some people, although not in the view of this Senator. But they are not reasons to support a group of guerrillas whose stated objective is to overthrow a government that we continue as a nation to have diplomatic relations with.

I made the point the other day, and I believe it is an accurate point, that the main argument that needs to be made to the American people and to the administration about the wrongness of this policy is that the policy is counterproductive.

The effect of our support of Contra activity is that the Sandinista government is strengthening its position within Nicaragua and it is strengthening the support that it receives from the Nicaraguan people. If our desire is that the Sandinista government be weakened and forced to change its position and be forced to liberalize its policies and lessen censorship and become more democratic, if that is our goal, then we cannot achieve that goal, in my view, by giving them an excuse to continue with repressive policies. And they use the activities of the Contras as an excuse to continue with censorship, as an excuse to continue to put off the election, although they have now set a definite date for the election. They use it as an excuse to continue to put major portions of their resources into military activities and military buildup.

I believe we need to eliminate that excuse. I believe we need to eliminate the outside effort or at least eliminate our support for the outside threat that the Sandinistas are using to solidify their support within that government.

I also believe that our policy of support for the Contras is dramatically undermining our credibility in the Central American region and with our other Latin neighbors. Clearly, we are engaged in supporting a force that is trying to interfere in the internal affairs of a neighboring country, in this case Nicaragua. And for us to piously argue legality in international affairs when we are engaged in this activity, and engaged in it in a very open way, I think puts us in an extremely awkward position.

I have had the opportunity to go to Honduras and to be briefed on Contra activity. I have had the opportunity to go to Nicaragua and be briefed on Contra activity. And I can say that the activities that we are engaged in down there with our tax dollars are not activities that I, as one Senator, want to tell my constituents that we are spending their money to support. I think clearly this is a policy that is doing us more harm than good. It is clearly a policy that is contrary to our legal obligations. It is clearly a policy that the American people will not support if they fully understand what we are engaged in.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I would just like to say that one of the advantages I had on the trip to Central America that I took with Senator CHAFEE in December was that I had the opportunity to visit with many present and former governmental officials in those countries. One former governmental official in Costa Rica made a point to me about the Contra activity. He said:

> If the United States is opposed to what the Sandinistas are doing—and they may well have good reason to oppose much of the Sandinista policy—why don't they use the normal channels and take the normal actions that a government of your power, of the power of the United States, would take in this circumstance? Why don't they use their diplomatic tools? Why don't they use their economic tools? Why don't they even use their military tools in a straightforward manner to deal with what they perceive as the problem there? It is not worthy of a nation like the United States to hire others to do our bidding or to pay others and supply others to do our bidding when we are not in fact willing to do that ourselves, to do the work that we consider needs to be done.

Mr. President, I do not support in any way a military intervention by this country into the affairs of Nicaragua or any other Central American country. But I would say that the policy we are pursuing now is a military intervention in that region of the world. It is one that we have masked behind various words such as "covert," such as "Contra," "paramilitary," whatever you want to call it, but the truth is it is not an activity worthy of the people of the United States. It is one that we should terminate. We have that opportunity here in the Senate this evening. And I hope that my colleagues will agree with me and vote to terminate the funding for this activity.

I yield back whatever time I have.

I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. I thank my distinguished friend from New Mexico.

Mr. President, if the Reagan administration seeks to moderate the Sandinista government in Nicaragua, it would appear to me that it is going about it in quite the wrong way. In fact, the military solutions which have been adopted are counterproductive to the stated policies of the United States, as my distinguished friend from New Mexico has so eloquently pointed out this afternoon.

Military harassment, mining of harbors, economic boycotts—what have these done? They have strengthened the hands of the Marxist factions within the Sandinistas. The policies of the administration have left the Sandinistas literally nowhere to turn except toward the Soviet Union and toward Cuba.

The administration's policies are giving the leftist extremists in Managua just the fuel they need to fire a Marxist revolution. These policies are radicalizing, I think, Mr. President, the more moderate elements of the Sandinista government.

By encouraging the Contra war and the terrorism that is associated with it—and make no mistake, there is an element of terrorism in this—the administration is giving the radical Sandinistas an opportunity to turn further to the left, to become more hardened in their Marxist doctrine, more dependent on the Soviet Union and Cuba and, as a result, more pro-Cuban and more pro-Soviet. And yet we are giving them just the reason they need to crush dissent and to fashion a truly totalitarian state.

I would remind my colleagues of the words of Arturo Cruz, perhaps the most respected of the Nicaraguan opposition politicai leaders. Last year he said:

> Backing the Contras indiscriminately could prove self-defeating to the United States. It weakens the moderating forces and strengthens the role of the extremists in Nicaragua.

Perhaps we should have listened to Señor Cruz, but instead it seems to be the policy to seek to widen the Contra war.

Just last month, Mr. President, according to press reports, the Contras killed 20 civilians and—according to the press—one small child. Five ships, including a Soviet freighter, have hit mines placed by the Contras in the Nicaraguan harbors. Soviet seamen were injured.

All of this has the flavor of terrorism. And terrorism of this type is contrary, I submit, to the heart and spirit of this great democracy of ours—a country that is committed to law and order at home and self-determination abroad.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a chronology of recent Contra attacks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the chronology was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

February 25—Two fishing boats hit mines and sink at the Caribbean port of El Bluff. Two more vessels are damaged; two crew are killed and seven wounded.

Late February to early March—Heavy fighting for 10 days near the Atlantic Coast town of Waspán. (3/6 WP) On 3/3, 14 Nicaraguan militiamen are killed by motars fired from inside Honduras. The FDN mine a stretch of the border inside Nicaraguan territory.

March 1—A Dutch dredging ship hits a mine at the Pacific port of Corinto. Five are injured; damages are assessed at $1 million.

March 1 to 4—The border towns of Bilwaskarma, Waspán, and Leimus are attacked with motars daily from Honduran territory.

March 3—A helicopter coming from Honduras attacks the Gulf of Fonseca port of Potosí, without causing damages. A helicopter fires two rockets at a Nicaraguan patrol launch.

Early March—1,400 rebels fight with Sandinista troops in northern Matagalpa province, 72 miles within Nicaraguan territory. Combat is expected to last 30 days.

March 6—Two launches armed with machine guns and 81-millimeter mortars attack a Nicaraguan military base at Montelimar on the Pacific Coast.

March 7—A Nicaraguan truck carrying 9,000 gallons of propane is blown up 3 miles from the Honduran border.

March 7—A Panamanian freighter is damaged by an explosion caused by mines at the port of Corinto.

Mid-March—1,500 Nicaraguan soldiers are sent to southeast Nicaragua to repel an ARDE attack.

March 11—The electrical sub-station at Villanueva near Somotillo is attacked with RPG-7 rockets. Los Naranjos military post, near Somotillo is also attacked the same day.

March 12—The FDN blows up several towers that carry electricity to Honduras from Somotillo in Nicaragua.

March 12—ARDE attacks the border posts of Peñas Blancas and Los Chiles in southern Nicaragua.

March 14—ARDE attacks a village in the department of Rio San Juan, killing a child and seriously wounding 4 others.

March 16—The FDN kills 3 peasants and a school director in Esteli.

March 16—Seven members of a farm cooperative are killed in San Ramón, Madriz.

March 17—Eleven peasants die in an ambush in Jinotega, and 7 more are abducted in Pueblo Nuevo, Esteli.

March 20—A Soviet oil tanker is seriously damaged when it hits a mine at the Pacific port of Sandino; 5 crewmen are injured.

March 20—An ambush outside of the town of San Rafael del Norte leaves 13 militiamen dead.

March 23—Two hundred rebels attack San Rafael del Norte, destroying the militia garrison, killing 7 militiamen.

March 25—The town of La Ceiba, Chinandega is attacked with artillery and mortar fire.

Mr. SASSER. I will detail just a few of these matters this afternoon, Mr. President. There are some 20 to 25 incidents of Contra activity within a 30-day period.

Beginning on February 25, two Nicaraguan fishing boats hit mines and sank at the Caribbean port of El Bluff; two more vessels are damaged, two fishermen are killed, and seven are wounded;

On March 1, a Dutch dredging ship hits a mine at the Pacific port of Corinto; five persons are injured; damage to the Dutch vessel is assessed at $1 million;

The same day border towns in Nicaragua are attacked with mortars firing from behind the Honduran border. Two days later a helicopter coming from Honduras attacks a Nicaraguan patrol boat in the Gulf of Fonseca firing two rockets, no hits;

On March 7, a Nicaraguan truck carrying 9,000 gallons of propane is blown up 3 miles from the Honduran border;

The same day a Panamanian freighter is damaged by an explosion caused by mines at the port of Corinto; and it goes on and on.

March 12 the FDN blows up several towers that carry electricity to Honduras from Nicaragua;

On March 14, the ARDE attacks a village in the department of Rio San Juan, killing a child and seriously wounding four others;

On March 16, the FDN kills three peasants and a school director in Esteli;

On March 16, seven members of a farm cooperative are killed in San Ramon, Madriz;

On March 17, 11 peasants die in an ambush and seven more are abducted in Puebo Nuevo, Esteli;

On March 20, a Soviet oil tanker is seriously damaged when it hits a mine at the Pacific port of Sandino and five crewmen are injured. It goes on and on.

Mr. President, the administration is supporting the Contras and its political leadership, the FDN, in a war that cannot be won. Press reports have indicated that even CIA assessments indicate the Contras cannot topple the Sandinistas. Independent observers have told me there is no chance of a Contra victory; no chance, that is, unless there is U.S. military intervention.

Last July, members of the FDN directorate publicly called for U.S. military intervention. They announced their plans a month later to occupy large portions of Nicaraguan territory and stated "we want repression to increase in Nicaragua. That is our strategy."

In February of this year a FDN communique called "for the immediate replacement" of the Sandinista government in Nicaragua.

Mr. President, we are supporting the Contras, despite these statements, despite the statements that they wish to overthrow the government of Nicaragua with force and violence. And despite the fact that some of their activities would be characterized as terrorist in other lands and in other times. And despite the fact—perhaps this is as damaging as any, Mr. President—that they cannot win. Not only are we throwing away tens of millions of taxpayers' dollars, but this great democracy, which Thomas Jefferson called over 200 years ago "the last best hope of mankind," is endorsing activities and supporting activities which are contrary to international law.

Of course, there are some who believe the Nicaraguans represent a military threat to its neighbors. There is no doubt that there has been a significant military buildup in Nicaragua. But most independent observers see that buildup as fundamentally defensive and substantially in response to U.S. policies and Contra attacks. I am advised that we have poured 25 percent more military aid into El Salvador and Honduras than the Cubans and Soviet bloc have sent to Nicaragua over the past 4 years.

But every time we step up military support for Contra attacks, the Sandinistas turn closer to the Soviets. Shortly after the Soviet ship hit a Contra-planted mine in Corinto Harbor, the Sandinista Defense Minister flew to the Soviet Union to plead for more aid.

Mr. President, some have stated that the Nicaraguans were planning to invade Honduras last year. But the former Chief of the Honduran Armed Forces, General Alvarez, publicly discounted such a possibility. In fact, a book just published by the Carnegie Foundation states:

> The current Nicaraguan buildup is fundamentally defensive and the Nicaraguan Army poses no immediate threat to its neighbors.

So if the Contras cannot topple the Sandinistas and they are not interdicting arms to El Salvador, what is our purpose in subsidizing their activities with American tax dollars?

The book in its study of Nicaragua goes further:

> Four-year arms build-up has made it unlikely that the country could be successfully invaded by any combination of Central American countries. Their forces are not sufficient to invade even the relatively lightly armed Honduras.

Continuing, the book states:

> Nicaragua would have difficulty sustaining an invasion, given its limited fuel supply and logistical capabilities, particularly if the Honduran Air Force struck Nicaraguan fuel and supply depots and the United States blocked resupply by sea.

Mr. President, originally the administration justified aid to the Contras on the grounds of interdicting the arms flow from Nicaraguan to Salvadoran rebels. But as early as April 1981 the State Department revealed that there has been "no hard evidence of arms movement through Nicaragua" since the State Department issued a white paper which purported to document such shipments. In March 1983 the New York Times reported that "no significant weapons shipments have been intercepted on their way to El Salvador in the last two years." The recent edition of "Foreign Affairs" also states that no such weapons were interdicted in all of 1983.

Administration officials have indicated that such military pressure could serve to bring the Sandinistas to the bargaining table.

Well, that is not very convincing because the Sandinistas have indeed offered to enter into negotiations. On July 19, 1983, the Government of Nicaragua offered to negotiate on the following points: Removal of foreign military advisers from the area, prohibiting the use of one country to carry out military destabilization of another country, and cutting off any arms flow or outside intervention in the internal affairs of any country in the area.

That is a pretty wide ranging agenda for negotiation, I would observe, Mr. President.

Again, last October the Nicaraguans published drafts of peace treaties for consideration of the United States and the Central American countries.

Mr. President, the Nicaraguans have stated they will sign a negotiated peace agreement which provides for onsite verification to assure that no Soviet or Cuban bases are built in Nicaragua and that no arms are being shipped to rebels fighting in other countries.

The Nicaraguans have now offered to negotiate on almost every point raised by the Reagan administration. But the Reagan administration has turned a deaf ear to these peace initiatives.

The administration says the Nicaraguans cannot be trusted to negotiate seriously. But how can that statement be verified unless we call their hand and attempt to enter into negotiations?

How do we know the Nicaraguans will not seriously negotiate unless we are willing to enter into negotiations. And what do we have to lose? If the Sandinistas do not negotiate in good faith or if they subsequently break a peace treaty, the United States still can exercise a whole host of options, including cranking up the Contras again, if we wish.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the draft peace treaties be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the text of the draft was ordered to be printed the RECORD, as follows:

DRAFT SECURITY TREATIES FOR CENTRAL AMERICA

GENERAL PRESENTATION

The history of the countries of the Central American isthmus has been characterized by foreign intervention, exploitation, and injustice. In the face of this reality, the peoples of the region have continuously struggled to liberate themselves and to forge a more honorable and humane life. This just cause has provoked the reaction of those who have identified their own interests with the maintenance of the status quo, reaching the extreme of accepting and justifying foreign intervention and promoting fratricidal wars between historically fraternal countries as a means to force their peoples to give up their desire for freedom. Today, in the face of the triumph of the Sandinista people's revolution, the repression against some peoples of the area has been intensified, while foreign intervention has reached alarming proportions, not only to stop the process of change in the region but to prevent the consolidation of the Sandinist people's revolution. At the same time, the regressive forces want to blame Nicaragua for the struggles in those countries, trying to conceal their real causes in order to justify the many aggressions that Nicaragua suffers, aggressions that are organized and directed by the U.S. Government.

In the face of the U.S. policy of militarily reestablishing its domination and hegemony in Central America, Latin America has replied by sponsoring and promoting processes of dialogue to achieve a peaceful solution on the basis of respect for the people's right to free self-determination, political and economic independence, and nonintervention in the domestic affairs of the Central American countries.

Nicaragua, which from the start has expressed support for the Contadora Group countries' initiative, and for whose success it has contributed its best efforts, reiterates that the reestablishment of peace and cooperation among the Central American countries requires, as a prior condition, that the security of those countries be guaranteed. For that purpose, Nicaragua has prepared the following attached draft agreements based on the basic principles established in international law, which should regulate relations among states in accordance with the UN Charter and within the spirit of the fourth joint meeting of the Contadora Group and Central American foreign ministers.

These documents, which cover only the aspects dealing with security, are not intended to exhaust all possible agreements that might be derived from the Contadora documents. Instead, they seek to lay the juridical bases and respective mechanisms of control to guarantee that the states will not be attacked from other states of the Central American region or from outside the region, with full respect for their right to self-determination and political and economic independence, thus creating conditions favorable for signing other agreements on military development and advisers, and on political, social, and economic affairs.

The following treaty drafts are presented as an indivisible whole. Omission of any of them would mean that the security of the states of the isthmus—the aim of Nicaragua's proposal—would not be duly guaranteed. This would make impossible the reestablishment of peace and the signing of other agreements.

INTRODUCTION

In April 1982, the U.S. Government presented an eight-point proposal to Nicaragua summarizing the conditions that, according to the U.S. Government, had to be fulfilled to achieve normalization of relations between the United States and Nicaragua. The Nicaraguan Government agreed to discuss these eight points if the United States would agree to discuss issues concerning Nicaragua. Despite this willingness to hold a dialogue, the U.S. Government refused to accept the continuation of the talks and in fact interrupted the informal exchange of letters that had been maintained until 13 August, the date of the last Nicaraguan message, which has yet to be answered.

After abandoning the path of dialogue, the U.S. Administration increased in quality and quantity its aggressions against Nicaragua, using as instruments counterrevolutionary mercenaries organized, trained, financed, armed, and directed by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), and intensified its political pressures and economic aggressions against Nicaragua.

Despite this situation, and guided by the desire to achieve the normalization of relations between the two states, the Nicaraguan Government deemed it essential to draft an instrument permitting an end to the aggressions, the normalization of relations between the two countries, and an eventual harmonious development of those relations within the most strict respect for the fundamental principles of international law.

Nicaragua believes that the reestablishment of peace and mutual respect between the United States and Nicaragua requires full gauarantees for its domestic and foreign security and the recognition of each people's right to freely choose their own destiny.

The very grave consequences of the U.S. policy against Nicaragua, which has led the U.S. Government to involve other countries of the area, using their territories as bases of operation and sanctuaries for counterrevolutionary activities, force Nicaragua to present this proposal for a treaty with the United States within the context of the efforts undertaken by the Contadora Group countries.

If the increased acts of aggression against Nicaragua and the rapid deterioration of the situation on the border with Honduras continue as a result of that U.S. policy, it could lead to unpredictable consequences, one of which would be direct involvement of U.S. troops in the conflict.

The magnitude of that threat and the impossibility of achieving reestablishment of peace in Central America without a clear U.S. decision to abandon its interventionist plans inevitably force the Contadora Group to also direct its efforts in that direction.

The present proposal for a treaty between the United States and Nicaragua responds to the Nicaraguan Government's firm determination to exhaust all possible legal resources to achieve a peaceful solution to the serious Central American crisis, within which the U.S. Administration plays a very important and inevitable role.

This draft treaty is an integral part of a general proposal that also includes a draft of a multilateral treaty with the Central American countries, a bilateral treaty with Honduras, and an agreement on respect for the Salvadoran people's right to self-determination.

Nicaragua hopes that this proposal, which includes all the substantial concerns that can be discussed between sovereign states—which with regard to Nicaragua have previously been expressed by the United States—will be properly evaluated by the U.S. Government, thus making possible the beginning of the normalization of relations between the United States and Nicaragua.

DRAFT TREATY TO GUARANTEE MUTUAL RESPECT, PEACE, AND SECURITY BETWEEN NICARAGUA AND THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The Governments of Nicaragua and the United States of America—considering that, for the maintenance of peace and security between the two nations and in the Central American area, trust and relations of friendship and cooperation between the two states must be reestablished and that those high objectives require, first of all, an end to all situations of belligerency and guarantees for their domestic and foreign security through respect for the fundamental principles that govern relations between states, mainly the principles of abstaining from resorting to threat and use of force, nonintervention, self-determination of peoples, territorial integrity, mutual respect, and sovereign equality of states, in accordance with the UN Charter—have agreed to the following:

CHAPTER I

Article 1. The high contracting parties solemnly promise in their international relations not to resort to the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of another state or as a means to resolve controversies that might emerge between both states.

Article 2. The high contracting parties condemn war of aggression [guerra de agresion] as a crime against humankind.

Article 3. The high contracting parties promise not to provide political, military, economic, or any other kind of support, direct or indirect, open or covert, to individuals or groups advocating the overthrow or destabilization of the other government, as well as to prevent, using all possible means, the use of their territory for the purpose of attacking or organizing attacks, acts of sabotage, or criminal or terrorist actions against the other state.

Article 4. The persons who are in the territory of each state may not be involved in any type of activity promoting, organizing, instigating, collecting funds for, or carrying out actions against the other state.

Article 5. The United States of America recognizes Nicaragua's inalienable right to its independence and self-determination as a sovereign state. It also recognizes that Nicaragua does not constitute a strategic reserve or area of influence of any foreign power, since that or similar concepts are an infringement of and incompatible with the sovereignty and independence of Nicaragua.

Article 6. Nicaragua declares that the exercise of its sovereign rights does not constitute a threat to the security of the United States and that it will not permit the use of Nicaraguan territory to affect or threaten the security of the United States or to attack any other state, furthermore guaranteeing the transit of U.S.-registered merchant ships and commercial airplanes through its territorial waters and airspace, in accordance with international laws and Nicaragua's national laws.

CHAPTER II

Article 7. The high contracting parties solemnly promise not to intervene, directly or indirectly, openly or covertly, for whatever reason, in the domestic or foreign affairs of the other state.

Article 8. The high contracting parties prohibit in their international relations armed intervention and any interference or threat against the legal entity [personalidad] of the other state or the political, economic, and cultural elements that comprise it.

Article 9. The high contracting parties also recognize the other state's inalienable right to choose its economic, social, cultural, and government system without interference from any other state.

Article 10. The high contracting parties declare incompatible with the present treaty all military, land, air, or sea maneuvers carried out or that can be carried out by the military forces of the other state at its own initiative or jointly with the armed forces of one or more states in the proximity of the territory of the other high party or in jurisdictional areas of the other state. The presence of war or espionage ships, airplanes, military units, or any other type of military force in or over the territory of the other state or in its jurisdictional waters is also incompatible.

CHAPTER III

Article 11. Neither of the high contracting parties will apply, support, or promote the use of economic, political, or any other kind of pressure to force the other state to subordinate its sovereign rights or to obtain from it any type of advantage.

Article 12. International commerce and other forms of economic cooperation between the high contracting parties will be practiced independently of any difference in economic, social, or governmental systems. All discrimination based only on those differences is incompatible with the present treaty. The discriminatory measures that might have been adopted by any of the high contracting parties to signing this treaty shall be abrogated.

Article 13. The high contracting parties recognize the right and the responsibility of each state to choose freely its objectives and means of development to mobilize fully and to use its resources, and to carry out economic and social reforms that will guarantee the full participation of its people in the process and the benefits of economic, social, and cultural development.

CHAPTER IV

Article 14. The high contracting parties solemnly promise to solve any situation or controversy through the peaceful means recognized by international law, so as not to endanger international peace and security.

Article 15. In the case of a controversy or situation between both states which affects or could affect international peace and security, the high parties will first of all attempt direct and friendly negotiations, including the establishment of mixed commissions, to achieve a solution, and if an agreement cannot be reached, they will resort to the other peaceful means of solution to controversies recognized by the UN Charter as established in the following articles.

Article 16. The high contracting parties, in case of conroversy, will abstain from adopting any measure that could worsen the situation, endangering the maintenance of international peace and security.

Article 17. The high contracting parties designate Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela as guarantor states of this treaty.

Article 18. If an agreement is not reached through direct negotiations or through previously established mixed commissions, they will resort to the good offices of the guarantor states. If this recourse is not successful, any of the parties can request from the UN Security Council the resolution of controversies or situations that affect or could affect international peace and security.

CHAPTER V

Article 19. Charges raised by any of the parties with regard to violations of this treaty may be submitted to the good offices of the guarantor states if no agreement is reached through direct negotiations or mixed commissions.

Article 20. Once the validity of the charges is proved, the state which is found guilty will be obliged to pay compensation to the aggrieved state for all damages inflicted on it and to cover the indemnities to which it may be entitled. Based on the damages, the guarantor states will determine the amounts to be paid and the mode of payment, as well as the measures that must be adopted to avoid a repetition of the violations of this treaty. The reparations to which this article refers constitute an international obligation.

Article 21. In the event of failure of the good offices of the guarantor states; or in the event that these states fail to propose a solution within a reasonable period, not exceeding 30 days or within the period agreed to by the parties, counted from the date of submission of the charges, any of the parties may have recourse to the UN Security Council, even before such deadline expires, in order for this forum to find a resolution to the controversy or situation.

CHAPTER VI

Article 22. This treaty in no way affects the rights and obligations of the parties as set forth in the UN Charter.

Article 23. This treaty will be in effect for a period of 5 years and can be extended for an equal period of time by agreement of the parties. It will take effect once the instruments of ratification are exchanged. In the event of its abrogation, this treaty will be in effect up to 1 year after notice thereof is sent to the other party.

Article 24. A copy of this treaty and of the ratification instruments will be filed with the UN Secretariat.

The Republics of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela will sign this treaty in their capacity as guarantor states.

In witness thereof, the plenipotentiary representatives of the Republic of Nicaragua and the United States of America sign this treaty in the English and Spanish languages, both of which are equally valid, in the city of . . . on . . . day of . . .

INTRODUCTION

In May of 1981, a meeting between the chiefs of state of Honduras and Nicaragua was held at the Guasaule Nicaraguan border post at Nicaragua's request. The meeting was aimed at reviewing the delicate situation on the border as a result of recent attacks on Nicaraguan territory by counterrevolutionary bands. It was agreed at these talks that a meeting between the top military leaders of the two nations should be held as soon as possible in order to agree on a way to coordinate a joint military patrol of the border area as a means of preventing incidents.

Unfortunately, Honduras refused to agree to this. Subsequently, in April 1982, after the present Honduran Administration took office, Nicaragua presented to Honduras a seven point peace proposal. A key point in this proposal was the signing of a nonaggression pact between the two states in an effort to halt the rapid deterioration of their relations as a result of constant attacks on our national territory and the growing participation of Honduran Armed Forces in counterrevolutionary activities promoted by the U.S. Government through the CIA. During that same month, April, the Honduran Government rejected in toto the Nicaraguan peace proposal. In August and September 1982, Nicaragua continued its efforts to reach an agreement with the Honduran Government, but these efforts met with the same negative response.

Understanding the grave consequences which could stem from the use of Honduran territory as a base of operations and refuge for the mercenary forces which commit many crimes against and attachs on Nicaragua every day, and in compliance with UN Security Council Resolution No. 530 which, in addition to expressing its serious concern over a possible military confrontation between Honduras and Nicaragua, urged interested states to take the steps necessary to avoid this conflict, the Nicaraguan Government feels that there is a pressing need to formalize the proposal for a nonaggression treaty between Honduras and Nicaragua which opens the path to peace, security, and mutual respect. This bilateral treaty with Honduras is perhaps more urgent because as time passes the participation of the Honduran Army grows and the U.S. military apparatus in that country increases its efforts to launch bigger and more dangerous military offensives against Nicaragua. This situation prepares the way for a generalized conflict which is rejected by the peoples of the two nations and repudiated by the Nicaraguan Government.

Intensified terrorist actions and the improvement of the aggressive war machinery against Nicaragua lends irrefutable and evident importance to this draft treaty which Nicaragua proposes with Honduras.

The proposed draft treaty, based on basic principles of international law, constitutes a new expression of the will for peace which guides Nicaraguan policy in its relations with all the countries of the world, particularly with its neighbors.

Nonintervention, prohibition of the threat of or use of force, and respect for people's self-determination are, among others, the principles on which the people's peace and security must be built.

Nicaragua expects that this draft treaty of peace, friendship, and cooperation will find a favorable and constructive response in the Honduran Government, which has expressed interest in a true restoration of peace and the normalization of relations between Honduras and Nicaragua, brother countries that are confronting one another mistakenly because of U.S. Government policy.

DRAFT OF THE PEACE, FRIENDSHIP, AND COOPERATION TREATY BETWEEN HONDURAS AND NICARAGUA

The Governments of Honduras and Nicaragua, anxious to strengthen the historic and fraternal ties joining the two nations and, as a result, determined to build peace and security between the two states, within the framework of respect for the principles of abstaining from resorting to threats of or use of force, nonintervention in the domestic affairs of other states, people's self-determination, peaceful solution of controversies, territorial integrity, and sovereign equality of states, and in accordance with provisions establisahed in the UN Charter, have agreed to the following:

CHAPTER I

Article 1. The Republics of Honduras and Nicaragua solemnly promise not to resort to threats of or the use of force as a means of solving controversies which may arise between the two states.

Article 2. The high contracting parties renounce the use of force to violate the sovereignty, territorial integrity, or political independence of the other state.

Article 3. Likewise, the high contracting parties promise not to give political, military, economic, or any other type of support to individuals or groups promoting the overthrow or destabilization of the other state's government, as well as to prevent, using every means available, the use of their territory to attack or organize attacks, acts of sabotage, kidnappings, or criminal actions in the territory of the other state.

Article 4. The high contracting parties, in an effort to comply with the provisions of this treaty, will disarm and remove from the border area any individual or individuals who enter their territory in an attempt to attack the other state. They will also prohibit any trafficking in arms and war materiel that may be used against the other state.

Article 5. The people within the territory of each state will not engage in any activity to promote, organize, or instigate actions against the other state or collect funds for these actions.

Article 6. In the event third countries declare war or carry out military actions against either of the two high contracting parties, both parties agree, in the most absolute manner, to refrain from forming alliances with or lending any kind of support to the enemies of either of the two republics. This does not impede the formation of alliances for the defense of their respective territories if they are attacked or invaded.

Article 7. Commercial and economic relations will not be used in any action against the sovereignty, the territorial integrity, or the political independence of the other party.

Article 8. The high contracting parties also agree to punish, according to their own internal laws and international treaties currently in effect, individuals who illegally seize ships or planes of the other state and take them to their respective territories. They also agree to sign an extradition agreement to punish these crimes. The ships or planes that are seized will be made available to the offended party as soon as possible, without being subject to retention or any legal measure.

CHAPTER II

Article 9. In the event of a controversy or situation between the two states that affects or may affect international peace and security, the high contracting parties will resort first to direct and friendly negotiations, including the formation of joint commissions, to solve the problem. If no agreement is reached, they will resort to other peaceful means to solve controversies recognized in UN Security Council Resolution No. 530, as established in the following articles.

Article 10. The high contracting parties designate the Republics of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela as guarantor states of this treaty.

Article 11. If no agreement is reached through direct negotiations or through joint commissions already created, they will resort to the good offices or the mediation of the guarantor states, which will receive every assistance available so that they can help resolve the controversy or situation presented to them.

Article 12. If, through the good offices or mediation of the guarantor states, an agreement is still not reached, either of the high contracting parties can ask the UN Security Council to resolve the controversy or the situation that affects or may affect international peace and security.

CHAPTER III

Article 13. To implement this treaty, the high contracting parties promise to disarm and to remove from the border area any individual or individuals inside their territory, as well as to dismantle any camps or bases in their territory that are used or may be used to organize or launch attacks on the territory or population of another state, or for any similar intention mentioned in this treaty.

Article 14. In the event that either of the contracting states denounces the existence of groups, camps, or bases in the other state or reports attacks originating in the other state without achieving positive results through direct negotiations, either of the parties may ask for the good offices or mediation of the states mentioned in Article 10 of this treaty.

The accusing party will present all the evidence supporting its claim to the foreign ministers of the guarantor states in order to facilitate the investigation of the charges.

The state that has been accused will permit and assist investigations that must be made in its territory in order to determine the validity or invalidity of the charge or charges presented.

Article 15. If the charge or charges are proven, the state that is found guilty will have to compensate the aggrieved state for all damages incurred, as well as any indemnification to which it is entitled. The Governments of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela will determine, based on the facts, the amount and form of payment, and any other measures that should be taken to avoid a further violation of this treaty. The reparation mentioned in this treaty is an international obligation.

Article 16. If the guarantor states cannot solve the controversy or situation within 30 days from the date the charge was presented, or if the seriousness of the situation warrants it, either of the parties may turn to the UN Security Council, even if the 30-day period has not passed, so that this forum can hear presentations and issue a resolution on the situation or controversy.

Article 17. This treaty in no way affects the rights and obligations of the high contracting parties as set forth in the UN Charter.

Article 18. This treaty will be in effect for a period of 5 years, and can be extended at the parties' will. It will take effect once the ratification documents are exchanged. In the event that either party abrogates the treaty, it will remain in effect for a period of 1 year after submission of the proper notification.

Article 19. A copy of this treaty and the ratification documents will be filed with the UN Secretariat.

The Governments of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela will sign this treaty in their capacity as guarantor states.

In witness thereof, the plenipotentiary representatives of the republic of Nicaragua and Honduras sign this treaty in the city of . . . . . on . . . . .

INTRODUCTION

The on-going nature and indefinite prolongation of the Salvadoran conflict seriously affect peace, security, and economc and social development in Central America.

In view of this situation, it is an unavoidable and moral duty to help, or at least not to obstruct, the efforts that are being carried out internally in El Salvador to find a political and negotiated solution to the conflict in that country in order to guarantee a stable and lasting peace, and to ensure a peaceful solution through legal means established by international law, in particular, fully respecting the sovereign rights of all peoples to decide their own destiny, without foreign intervention, coercion, or threats.

The constant and increasing U.S. Government intervention in the internal Salvadoran struggle is a key factor that obstructs and complicates the achievement of a political and negotiated solution, because it has become, in fact, the main arms supplier for the government forces directly, and for the revolutionary forces indirectly.

In order to justify its interventionist policy in El Salvador, the U.S. Government has accused Nicaragua of engaging in alleged arms trafficking for revolutionary forces from Nicaraguan territory, a pretext that the United States has also used as a justification to attack the Sandinist people's revolution and the Nicaraguan people politically, economically, and militarily, both overtly and covertly.

Aware of this situation, and in a new effort to contribute to a political solution, the Nicaraguan Government made public on July 19, 1983 a call to the countries involved in which it requested "an absolute halt to the supply of weapons by any country to the forces in conflict in El Salvador, so that those people can solve their problems without foreign interference."

Having received no reply to that call, the Nicaraguan Government has considered it necessary to formalize that proposal in concrete and detailed terms, in the form of an agreement to be signed by all the countries involved in El Salvador. In any case, Nicaragua is willing to sign immediately, even with just the United States, such an agreement, so that the U.S. Government will not be able to continue to justify its interventionist policy in El Salvador on the basis of alleged actions by Nicaragua.

DRAFT AGREEMENT TO CONTRIBUTE TO THE PEACEFUL SOLUTION OF THE ARMED CONFLICT IN EL SALVADOR

The governments of * * *

Considering the fact that the grave crisis being experienced by El Salvador, resulting from the armed conflict taking place there, is one of the principal factors that affects peace and security in the Central American region, and that all nations have the obligation, without detriment to the principles of nonintervention and the self-determination of peoples, to contribute through all possible legal means to ending the bloodshed in El Salvador and to promoting a peaceful solution that will make possible an end to the hostilities between the forces in conflict and the reestablishment of peace and harmony in El Salvador; and

Bearing in mind that the maintenance of the supply and traffic of weapons and military supplies and military and economic aid to the forces in conflict makes it very difficult to achieve a peaceful negotiated solution that will put a stop to the armed conflict being experienced by El Salvador, they have agreed on the following:

CHAPTER I

Article 1: The high contracting parties promise not to provide, or, in this case, promise to suspend, the military aid and training and the supply and traffic of weapons and arms to the forces in conflict directly or indirectly through third states.

Article 2: The high contracting parties likewise promise to adopt in their respective territories the measures that might be necessary to prevent the supply of and traffic in weapons and arms and provision of military aid and training to the forces in conflict in El Salvador.

Article 3: The high contracting parties also promise to use their good offices, jointly or on their own initiative, with third states that supply or permit the traffic in weapons and arms or that supply military aid and training to the forces in conflict in El Salvador, so that they will suspend this supply and aid, and join the efforts being undertaken for the reestablishment of peace and harmony in that nation.

Article 4: In order to ensure fulfillment of the provisions of this agreement by all the individuals and persons representing groups in their respective territories, the high contracting parties will adopt all the necessary measures to prevent the supply of and traffic in weapons and military supplies to any of the forces in conflict in El Salvador. For this purpose, vigilance at the borders, ports, airports, coastal areas, and any other places that can be used for that purpose will be reinforced.

Article 5: The high contracting parties also promise not to provide and, in this case, promise to suspend, all types of economic, financial, or technical aid that are or could be destined for the purchase of weapons and arms by the forces in conflict, or for the training of troops or other military objectives. They will also undertake the necessary efforts so that third states suspend the economic, financial, or technical aid that they provide for the same or similar objectives noted in this article.

Article 6: The high contracting parties also promise to promote and support in international forums all the initiatives to contribute to the reestablishment of peace in El Salvador, particularly those that promote a halt to the supply of and traffic in weapons and arms and provision of military aid and training to the forces in conflict in that country, and in this case, not to oppose in any forum the resolutions or sanctions that are proposed for that purpose.

Article 7: The high contracting parties designate Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela as guarantor states of this agreement.

CHAPTER II

Article 8: If no solution is found through direct negotiations to charges made by any of the high parties with regard to the violation of this treaty, those charges can be submitted to the good offices or mediation of the guarantor states.

Article 9: In order to facilitate the investigation of the charges, the party that raises the accusations will present all the evidence and proof on which it bases its charges to the foreign ministers of the guarantor states. The accusing state will permit and provide facilities for all the necessary investigations to be carried out in its territory in order to determine the validity or invalidity of the charge or charges presented.

Article 10: If the good offices or mediation of the guarantor states are not successful or if a solution is not presented within an appropriate period of no more than 30 days, or within a period agreed upon by the high contracting parties, beginning from the date the charge or charges were presented, or if the seriousness of the situation makes it necessary, any of the parties can have recourse to the UN Security Council, even before the expiration of that period, so that this forum can hear presentations and resolve the controversy or situation.

Article 11: This agreement will take effect once the pertinent instruments have been exchanged, and will remain in force for the duration of the current armed conflict in El Salvador. A copy of this agreement will be filed with the UN Secretariat.

The governments of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela will sign this agreement as guarantor states.

In witness whereof, the plenipotentiary representatives of the Governments of * * * sign this agreement in the city of * * * on * * * of * * *.

INTRODUCTION

The crisis affecting the Central American region, the real causes of which are the centuries-old poverty and the oppression of its people, has been substantially aggravated by the foreign interventionism that has plagued the region since its independence and that has been and is one of the principal factors behind the profound situation of prevailing injustice and the consequent state of political and social turbulence in the region.

Since the inauguration of the Reagan administration, the Sandinist people's revolution has become the target of military, political, and economic aggressions by the United States, to the detriment of the Nicaraguan people.

Since 1981, Nicaragua has been daily suffering aggressions and "covert actions" from other countries, actions that violate international law and that are financed and directed by the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), yet the U.S. Government tries to present Nicaragua as the country that threatens the peace and security of other countries of the region. These charges are simply a pretext used by the U.S. Government in an attempt to justify its "covert actions" against Nicaragua.

In order to establish clearly Nicaragua's unlimited support for the principles of international law which should govern relations among sovereign states, the Government of National Reconstruction has considered it necessary to formalize this draft of a general treaty among the Central American countries.

In proposing this draft treaty, Nicaragua is confident that it will be positively received by the governments that are sincerely determined to guarantee international peace and security and to promote fraternal and harmonious relations among the Central American countries.

DRAFT GENERAL TREATY ON THE MAINTENANCE OF PEACE AND SECURITY AND ON RELATIONS OF FRIENDSHIP AND COOPERATION AMONG THE CENTRAL AMERICAN REPUBLICS

The Governments of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua, fully aware that the maintenance of peace and security in the region and the promotion of relations of friendship and cooperation among the nations of the region are necessary for the development and well-being of their peoples, and that the achievement of these lofty aspirations requires from the Central American states absolute respect for the fundamental principles that govern relations among states, such as the principles of nonintervention, self-determination of peoples, abstention from the threat or use of force, peaceful solution of controversies, respect for territorial integrity, and respect for the sovereign equality of states, principles that are established in the UN Charter; and

Recognizing that the Central American states' legitimate concern about guaranteeing their security has generated a trend of military development at present that tends to cause the political situation in the region to deteriorate and to divert economic resources that should be invested in the development of the Central American peoples, and that this situation makes a priority the adoption of adequate measures to guarantee that security through respect for the fundamental principles of international law, as has been pointed out;

Therefore, the Governments of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua have agreed on the following to guarantee peace and security among their states:

CHAPTER I

Article 1: The high contracting parties solemnly promise, in the conduct of international relations, not to resort to the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any of the contracting states.

Article 2: The high contracting parties will not resort to the threat or use of force to violate the existing international borders of the other states as a means of resolving international controversies, including territorial controversies and the problems related with the borders of the states.

They will also abstain from carrying out any act of reprisal that involves or could involve the use of force.

Article 3: The high contracting parties will abstain, in their respective territories, from organizing, promoting, or tolerating the organization of irregular forces or bands, whether armed or unarmed, including mercenaries, to undertrake incursions into the territory of other states.

Article 4: The high contracting parties will adopt the necessary measures to prevent the use of their respective territories to organize, instigate, help, or participate in acts that constitute an attack on the internal or external security of other states and to prevent activities organized inside their territory to commit such acts.

CHAPTER II

Article 5: The high contracting parties solemnly promise not to intervene, directly or indirectly, for whatever reason, in the domestic or foreign affairs of any of the other states.

Article 6: The high contracting parties prohibit, in their international relations, armed intervention or any interference or threat that constitutes an attack on the legal entity of the other states, or the political, economic, and cultural elements that comprise them.

Article 7: They will also abstain from organizing, supporting, promoting, financing, instigating, or tolerating armed, terrorist, or subversive activities intended to overthrow the regime of another state or to intervene in internal struggles of other states.

Article 8: The high contracting parties recognize the inalienable right of states to choose their economic, social, political, and cultural system without interference from any other state.

Article 9: None of the high contracting parties will implement, support, or promote the use of economic, political, or any other type of measures designed to coerce the other states in order to achieve the subordination of the exercise of their sovereign rights or to obtain from them any type of advantage.

Article 10: International commerce and other forms of economic cooperation among the high contracting parties will be carried out independently of any difference in political, economic, and social systems. No state shall be the object of any discrimination based solely on such differences.

Article 11: Considering the essential responsibility of promoting economic, social, and cultural development of their respective peoples, the high contracting parties have the right and responsibility of freely choosing their objectives and means of development, of mobilizing and fully using their resources, and of undertaking economic and social reforms that will guarantee their peoples' full participation in the process of development and in its associated benefits.

CHAPTER III

Article 12: Ratifying their status as free, sovereign, and independent states, the high contracting parties declare that neither the Central American region nor any of the states that comprise it can become strategic reserve of any foreign state.

Article 13: The high contracting parties will not authorize the installation in their respective territories of foreign military bases—army, naval, or air force—or military schools, nor will they permit their bases or national schools to be used for the training of soldiers who are not nationals of their respective countries.

Article 14: Without the prior agreement of all other high contracting parties, land, sea, or air military exercises of foreign forces or joint exercises with foreign forces in their respective territories or in the areas under their jurisdiction, or any type of military exercise in which members of foreign armed forces participate or in which war materiel belonging to foreign armed forces is used, will not be permitted, authorized, or tolerated.

Article 15: In the event third countries declare war on or carry out military actions against any of the high contracting parties, no Central American state will establish an offensive alliance with or provide any aid or support to the enemies of any of the Central American republics. This does not prevent the establishment of alliances for the defense of their respective territories if an attack or invasion takes place.

Article 16: The high contracting parties agree to cancel, within a period of 30 days, any maneuvers, exercises, or military training in which foreign forces are participating. They also agree to eliminate foreign bases, installation, and military schools within a period of 90 days. Both terms will be operational from the date this treaty goes into effect.

Article 17: The high contracting parties agree to punish, in accordance with their own laws and international treaties in effect, any individuals who illegally seize ships or airplanes of the other states and take them to their respective territories. They also agree to sign extradition treaties regarding this type of crime. The ships or airplanes that are seized will be returned to the aggrieved party as soon as possible, without retaining them or subjecting them to any legal action.

Article 18: To implement this treaty, the high contracting parties promise to disarm and to remove from the border area any individuals or groups inside their territory, as well as to dismantle any camps or bases in their territory that are used or may be used to organize or launch attacks on the territory or population of another state, or for any similar intention mentioned in this treaty.

CHAPTER IV

Article 19: The high contracting parties solemnly promise to resolve any situation or controversy through peaceful means recognized by international law so that international peace, security, and justice are not jeopardized.

Article 20: In the event of a controversy or a situation that may affect peace and security, the high contracting parties will resort to direct or friendly negotiations, including the formation of joint commissions, to resolve them; if no agreement is reached, they will resort to other means for the peaceful solution of controversies recognized in UN Security Resolution No 530, as established in the following:

Article 21: The high contracting parties will abstain from adopting any measure that may aggravate the situation to the extent of endangering international peace and security.

Article 22: The high contracting parties designate the Republics of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela as guarantor states of this treaty.

Article 23: If no agreement is reached through direct negotiations or through joint commissions already created, they will resort to the good offices or the mediation of the guarantor states, which will receive every assistance available so that they can help resolve the controversy or situation presented to them.

Article 24: If, through the good offices or mediation of the guarantor states, an agreement is still not reached, either of the high contracting parties can ask the UN Security Council to resolve the controversy or situation that affects or may affect international peace and security.

CHAPTER V

Article 25: Charges pressed by any of the states regarding the violation of this treaty will be presented, with the pertinent evidence, to the guarantor states. The guarantor states will be then asked to launch appropriate investigations in order to determine the admissibility or inadmissibility of the charges. The high contracting parties wil accept as binding the resolution issued by the guarantor states. The accusing party will present all evidence supporting its claim to the foreign ministers of the guarantor states in order to facilitate investigation of the charges.

The state that has been accused will permit and assist the investigations that must be made in its territory in order to determine the validity or invalidity of the charge or charges presented.

Article 26: If the charge or charges are proven, the state that is found guilty will have to compensate the aggrieved state for all damages incurred, as well as any indemnification to which it is entitled. The guarantor states will determine, based on available facts, the amount and form of payment, and any other measures that should be taken to avoid a further violation of this treaty. The reparation mentioned in this treaty is an international obligation.

Article 27: If the guarantor states cannot solve the controversy or situation within 30 days from the date the charge or charges were presented, or if the seriousness of the situation warrants, either of the parties may turn to the UN Security Council, even if the 30-day period has not passed, so that this forum can hear presentations and issue a resolution on the situation or controversy.

Article 28: This treaty in no way affects the rights and obligations of the high contracting parties as set forth in the UN Charter.

Article 29: This treaty will remain in effect for a period of 5 years, and can be extended at the parties' will. It will take effect once the fifth ratification instrument is delivered. In the event that this treaty is abrogated, it will remain binding on the party that abrogated it for a period of 1 year after the submission of the proper notification. It will continue in effect as long as three of the high parties wish it to be in force.

Article 30: The foreign ministry of the republic of * * * will be charged with sending certified authentic copies of the ratification documents to the signatory and guarantor states.

A copy of this treaty and the ratification documents will be filed with the UN Secretariat.

The Governments of Colombia, Mexico, Panama, and Venezuela will sign this treaty in their capacity as guarantor states.

TRANSITORY PROVISION

Article 1: Once the security of the Central American states is guaranteed through agreements among the countries of the region, as well as through the signing of agreements between the Central American states and those extraregional states which constitute a threat to any of the Central American states, the high contracting parties express their willingness to consider other matters of general interest, such as military advisers in the region.

In witness thereof, the plenipotentiary representatives of the Republics of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua sign this treaty in the city of on .

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, administration officials say that we cannot allow the Sandinistas to consolidate their control in Nicaragua, but by supporting the war against the Sandinistas we are giving them the opportunity, indeed we are providing them with an excuse to declare a state of siege, suppress dissent, and build up their army.

One final word, Mr. President, Nicaragua is going to hold an election this November—a year earlier than was promised by the Sandinistas.

There has not been a truly free election in Nicaragua in 50 years. It is a matter of speculation as to whether these elections will be truly free and open and if the political opposition will be allowed to participate without harassment.

One thing is clear, however: There can be no truly free and open elections during a war. By supporting the Contras we are, in essence, assuring the failure of the election process in Nicaragua.

Mr. President, the time is now to negotiate. The time is now to end the bloodshed. The time is now to halt a military buildup which could ultimately lead to U.S. intervention.

Further aid to the Contras only runs the risk of hostilities getting out of hand.

Mr. President, I do not feel that any American soldier should be asked to subject himself or herself to hostile fire in Central America, certainly not on the periphery of Nicaragua or in Nicaragua, until every political and negotiating option has been exhausted. So far, I am sad to say that the administration has failed to seize the opportunities that have been offered.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator from Rhode Island may require.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HECHT). The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Massachusetts for yielding.

Mr. President, I have taken the floor on a number of occasions to express my strong opposition to the funding of covert operations against the Government of Nicaragua.

The funding by the U.S. Government of covert operations against the Government of Nicaragua is illegal, is immoral, and is not befitting the noble principles that have served as the guiding force behind the foreign policy of our Nation.

It is against the Charter of the United Nations and, theoretically, it is a policy we oppose in El Salvador. We see the peculiar phenomenon here that one nation's terrorists are to be destroyed by the U.S. Government while at the same time, we encourage our own terrorists.

Furthermore, the policy to fund covert operations is counterproductive. In my view, it is serving to strengthen the Sandinistas as the Nicaraguan people rally behind the government in the face of foreign intervention.

The covert policy is serving to push the Nicaraguan Government further to the Soviet Union; witness Daniel Ortega's trip to request minesweepers from the Soviets.

It was inconceivable 1 year ago that he would have gone to the Soviet Union to request minesweepers. He cannot get minesweepers from the United States so he has to get them from somewhere. So he goes to the obvious source.

On this whole question of mining, I know when I was in the Foreign Service, and in my studies, I always understood that the mining of a harbor was casus belli—a cause of war—but apparently now it is being done with impunity.

Maybe the people laying the mines are not American citizens. Maybe the mines are being attached together by non-American citizens. But the fact remains, which we all know, that those mines originated in the United States.

I would believe that this is a very dangerous thing indeed. Maybe these mines are small, or are set in such a way that one thinks no great disaster will occur. But if, let us say, one foreign vessel is sunk, is destroyed, one Soviet life is lost, the life of one citizen of another nation is lost, then we have a real international incident. One that we really should have avoided, could have avoided, and, if this amendment were adopted, would have avoided.

This policy is an extremely dangerous one because it is bringing this Nation closer to direct military involvement in Central America, with which we are all concerned.

We know that some of the airfields constructed or improved in Honduras are in areas where the Contras are openly operating. This raises the specter that U.S. forces may be cooperating with the Contras at these facilities, supposedly there for maneuvers between the United States and the Honduran military.

The fact that these airfields exist, I think, is a very deplorable development.

Mr. President, I must say I congratulate the Senator from Tennessee because he has almost as many cosponsors to his amendment, which attempts to prevent a permanent military presence in Honduras, as I was able to gain votes on this floor almost 2 years ago when I spoke to this same subject.

The deaths of U.S. military personnel and incidents that have occurred on the Nicaragua-Honduras border are very probably related to the presence of these airfields and to these Contra operations.

Mr. President, I hope that my colleagues will see fit to vote for this amendment, which I am very glad to support.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am reluctant to extend this debate and will not do so for long. I understand another Senator who wishes to speak is on his way to the floor. I simply point out to the Senate that the aid that we are talking about was certified by the former President of the United States; it has been recertified by the present President of the United States; it was passed by the Senate last year on a Consent Calendar. In the Intelligence Committee, all of those who voted, voted in favor of it. In the Appropriations Committee, the covert aid was approved as an amendment to this bill by a voice vote.

I find it difficult to understand the opposition here, Mr. President, although I do not question the right of anyone to raise that opposition. There have been some statements that I would like to correct.

In the first place, the junior Senator from Tennessee has indicated, and he quoted a source for his position, that the Nicaraguan military force is not offensive in nature. He said it was fundamentally defensive. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in 1983 figures, even based on the conservative estimates that were stated by Senator GOLDWATER, the Nicaraguans now have 17-plus people out of every 1,000 in the armed forces. That compares to 3.1 in 1977. It compares to its neighbors of Honduras, Guatemala, and El Salvador. When you add those up together, they are just slightly less than 60 percent—all of the neighboring countries around Nicaragua have about 60 percent of the military forces that the Nicaraguans have.

Nicaraguans now have three battalions of Soviet tanks; 200 antiaircraft guns and surface-to-air missiles, 100 antitank guns, 60 armored personnel carriers. They have a Soviet patrol boat, two North Korean patrol boats, eight military transport planes.

Why a nation that is one-ninth the size of my State needs military transport planes of that type, we do not understand, unless it is to transport their people out of their country. They have 14 to 18 Soviet attack helicopters and, currently, there is being spent in Nicaragua $300 million in military construction. That $300 million comes in the form of military aid to the Nicaraguan Government.

Nicaragua has already increased its number of people in uniform to about 138,000, including those that were mentioned by Senator GOLDWATER. Our figures are slightly higher—25,000 in the active armed forces, 25,000 reserve, 80,000 militia, another 8,000 in security forces. Under Somoza, who was attacked as a military dictator, there were 9,000 in the national guard. That is the comparison, Mr. President. The military dictator had 9,000 and we are looking at a defensive structure that totals 138,000.

We just do not understand anyone who would assert that that force, that tremendous military force in this tiny country, is defensive only.

Again, I am hopeful that the Senate will realize that this matter has been gone into in depth by those who are authorized by the Senate to conduct the examination of covert activities. By the very nature of the subject that is before us, it is not something that we can debate here too easily. But it is clear that the purpose of our aid is not to overthrow a government, but to find ways to keep pressures on this Nicaraguan Sandinista government to honor their commitments to reform, to pursue the objectives of the Contadora group, and to continue their offer of amnesty to the insurgents against that government. That program has been successful. Those of us who went to Honduras found adequate evidence that the Nicaraguan attacks on the Honduras border had ceased, that the flow of arms into El Salvador is coming to an end, and we hope the military in Nicaragua now knows that it cannot continue its buildup for the purpose of exporting revolution.

My last comment would be directed toward the assertion of the Senator from California. It is interesting how two human beings can see facts and come to diametrically opposite conclusions. I look at Central America as a former Californian, with my family still deeply entrenched in California, and I see Nicaragua as an offensive nation, one with active participants now in its armed forces from Cuba, from the Soviet Union, from East Germany, and from other Iron Curtain countries. I see it a tremendous military force that has no utility at all in defense. It is only equipped for offense. It has a different aspect from the Cuban force. The difference is that it is on land that is connected both to South and North America. It is adjacent to the international highway. It does have access to its neighbors by land. It does have now, as I indicated, three battalions of Soviet tanks, modern tanks. It can go by land to its neighbors. Cuba cannot, without landings. Cuba cannot come into Central America and Mexico the way the Soviets can from Nicaragua.

It is amazing to me that the same people who would find some question about our activities in trying to keep pressure on this government to keep its commitments somehow or other would differentiate the Nicaraguan Government, Sandinista government and find a quiet, agrarian, reformist type government. There is no nation in the world that bristles more with military arms on a per capita basis than does Nicaragua. I would challenge any Senator to find any nation in the world with as many people armed and trained as Nicaragua, based on population. Based on population——

Mr. LEAHY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENS. Let me finish that statement. Based on population, they have more commitment to arms than any nation in the world. Anyone who thinks you can overthrow a government so armed with a total of $45 million had better start doing some arithmetic in the defense area. All this is doing is keeping pressure on that government to let them know we will not allow them to export revolution and that we will not allow them, and I think we should serve notice on them, to attack their neighbors with the tremendous Soviet-Cuban military force they have harbored within their borders. It would be a disaster to this hemisphere should it happen.

I would be happy to yield to my friend.

Mr. LEAHY. I am sorry. I was going to ask a question, but if the Senator has more——

Mr. STEVENS. I would be happy to yield.

Mr. LEAHY. Will the Senator agree, however, that with the possible exception of the tip of his own State, the largest Soviet buildup facing the United States is in Cuba—or rather, the largest Soviet force nearest the United States is in Cuba?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, that is true, but it has no land access to this hemisphere.

Mr. LEAHY. Will the Senator agree that there has been a greater buildup of Soviet presence in Cuba in the last 3 years than anytime since the Cuban missile crisis?

Mr. STEVENS. The Cubans have shared in a Soviet buildup worldwide. The Soviet Union has continued in the last 3 years its inexorable march toward military domination. We see that in Cuba, too, but I do not think the Soviet buildup in Cuba on a percentage basis anywhere near compares with the percentage increase in military capability per capita in Nicaragua. Cuba had a much higher level of military armament at the time this recent buildup started as compared to Nicaragua. Nicaragua, as I said, under what some people called a dictator, had 9,000 people in its national guard. It now has 138,000 people under this agrarian reform.

Mr. LEAHY. If the Senator will yield a moment, perhaps I stated my question inartfully and I would state it again with a little bit of background. I recall that in 1980 there was a great deal of discussion about a Soviet brigade in Cuba and the buildup by the Soviets in Cuba. A lot of people asked how this buildup could possiby be allowed to happen. Is it the understanding of the Senator that there has been a far greater buildup of the Soviet presence and a far greater increase in Soviet capabilities in Cuba during the past 3½ years than there had been in any other 3½-year period of time since the Cuban missile crisis.

I ask the question only because of the reference by the Senator to Cuba at one point.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not deny to my friend the buildup and rapidity of the buildup in Cuba. Again, I say the pace of the buildup on a comparative per capita basis in Nicaragua is much, much greater in the last years.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, has the Senator yielded the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I seek the floor in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the Senator from Alaska is quite right in saying there has been a great Soviet buildup in Cuba. I hope none of us lose sight of exactly what the facts are. There was a great deal of rhetoric, as I said, in 1980 about a Soviet brigade in Cuba. My own feeling at that time was that the Miami unit of the Florida National Guard was a match for the Soviet brigade. But the point is that with all our talk about Central America and how tough we are going to be about Central America, in the past 3½ years there has been a far greater buildup of Soviet capabilities in Cuba than in any other administration, Republican or Democrat, since the Cuban missile crisis.

I also want to speak because there has been a suggestion that the Senate Intelligence Committee unanimously approved the covert action. I almost hate to use the term covert action about anything that is discussed openly on the front pages of the newspapers, and that has been discussed openly by the administration even before they sent it up to the Intelligence Committee. But there has been a suggestion that the Senate Intelligence Committee unanimously approved covert action funds. That is not so; 14 Senators voted for it. There are, of course, 15 members on the committee. I note that I did not vote for it. I did not vote for it because I do not think it works. I have no doubt there are a lot of problems with the Sandinista government. As I stated on the floor of the Senate last year and the year before, I feel in some ways the Sandinistas have betrayed their own revolution. But at a time when open opposition to the Sandinistas was coming from the press, from business, from labor, and from the church, what do we do? We come blundering in with a "covert" action that we announce in every capital of the world, certainly in all the news media, and what does that do? It allows the Sandinistas to say, in effect to the Nicaraguan people, "What do you want? Do you want us even though an imperfect government, given all the problems we have, even though we haven't fulfilled all our promises? Or do you want the United States through the CIA to take us over?" And, of course, what happened? Exactly what anybody would expect. The Sandinistas got more of a revival of nationalistic fervor in Nicaragua than they ever could have otherwise.

We did more to bring together a cohesion of thought and support for the Sandinistas than anything they could have done themselves, simply by saying that we were going to use the CIA and the great power of the United States apparently to overthrow them.

I agree that $55 million does not overthrow much of a government these days, at least not a country quite as large as Nicaragua. It might overthrow a smaller one throughout the Caribbean, but not one as large as Nicaragua. But certainly if it is shown to be funneled through an organization not popular in Nicaragua, it will do a lot to shore up nationalistic feelings, and that is what happened.

Mr. President, for very good reasons, the Select Committee on Intelligence has a strong tradition of not speaking publicly about classified matters before it, even ones which have become common knowledge. However, the so-called covert action program in Central America, is covered on nightly national television news and daily discussed in the newspapers. As I said, it has been discussed by administration officials, either in off-the-record briefings or publicly, before they tell the Intelligence Committees. It has become a major foreign policy issue. It threatens to pull the United States deeper into a widening war in Central America. Therefore, I have no choice but to speak out.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point,

Mr. LEAHY. I yield.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senator is not asserting, is he, that this administration took a covert matter and went into a public foreign policy position on it? It was the House, in conference committee last year, on the appropriations bill, that put the limitation on covert aid. Until that time, it was a covert program.

Mr. LEAHY. I am sure the Senator is not suggesting that there has not been a great deal of discussion on the front pages of most newspapers, quoting, in many instances, administration sources, long before that conference committee. If that is what the Senator is suggesting——

Mr. STEVENS. There were no details of this covert program. There was no acknowledgment, other than the certification of the previous President and this President, on a public basis, of this activity until the conference report required a specific limitation on this covert program.

This Senator was asked repeatedly for comments about this, and we directed those people to the Intelligence Committee, as is the normal course.

The Intelligence Committee of the Senate did not in any way discuss publicly this program.

What provoked this into the newspapers was, in fact, the limitation that was put on this covert action by the Appropriations Committee in the continuing resolution conference—a limitation that I opposed and which was inconsistent with the authorization. The authorization that came out of the Intelligence Committee for fiscal year 1984 would have authorized the $24 million and this amount. As a matter of fact, the subsequent action the Intelligence Committee authorized was unnecessary.

Under the circumstances, we had no objection to the authorization committee again reaffirming its support for this amount. But this was not something that went from a covert to a public foreign policy issue because of the administration or because of any Member of the Senate, to my knowledge.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I have to disagree with my friend from Alaska. There were certainly ample discussions of this covert activity in the news media long before the committee of conference. There were open discussions within the cloakrooms of this body that there were those within the committees who were receiving the material in classified session subsequent to the time they had read it in the open news media.

I also state to my good friend from Alaska that if he would be willing to go back and look at the record, he will find that those were leaks that came not from Members of this body, either Republican or Democrat, but from administration officials.

Mr. STEVENS. There again, that is not so. The House of Representatives started an attack on this after it discovered—Members other than the Intelligence Committee members—discovered the existence of a covert program which was started by the previous administration.

Mr. LEAHY. How did they discover it?

Mr. STEVENS. Do not ask me. I assume they discovered it from information they got from the Foreign Affairs Committee, from the Central American sources.

Mr. LEAHY. Or a newspaper.

Mr. STEVENS. That led to comments by the Secretary of State. But on two occasions there was an attempt previously to bring this covert program into an area which was not covert, and that was opposed by the Intelligence Committee, as the Senator knows. It was the Intelligence that said this had to remain as a covert area.

Mr. LEAHY. I say to my friend from Alaska that we may be getting off the point. But I suggest that he may want to go back and look at the sequence of events, because I remember them very well, from the discussions we had in the Intelligence Committee. I recall, without going into anything that would require us to go into closed session, that a number of people on both sides of the aisle expressed their concern that they were then being briefed on materials that they had read in the paper, in a number of instances, quoting administration sources. I am not suggesting that the whole thing was laid out in public, by any means.

I know that in my own case—and I probably go to those briefings as religiously as anyone else—I read much of this material in the open press prior to being briefed here.

My purpose in being here is to state emphatically my opposition to this administration's support of an insurgency against Nicaragua, a nation with which the United States has full diplomatic relations. If we are going to do this, let us break off relations; if we will not cut off diplomatic relations, we should break off this activity.

This attempt to substitute covert action and secret war for a foreign policy is part of an overall administration policy which is leading this country and our friends in Central America toward a larger war. The damage to America's position in Central America will be lasting and will go beyond this or the next two or three administrations.

In January of last year, I visited Central America, including Honduras. I met with a wide variety of American and local officials to discuss the political and military situation in the region. On my return, I prepared a classified report to the Select Committee on Intelligence. I believe few Senators bothered to read it. I also called the attention of Senators to the dramatic expansion and transformation of the covert action program in Central America.

Subsequently, on April 28, I spoke to the Senate at length about the thrust of the administration's policy of military pressure and covert action in Central America. I raised questions about whether the covert action did not violate the Boland amendment, which prohibits U.S. assistance to groups for the purpose of overthrowing the Sandinista government. Others joined me at that time in raising concerns about whether the covert action violated article 18 of the Charter of the Organization of American States and article 2 of the United Nations Charter.

Again, the Senate remained silent.

Last fall, during consideration of the fiscal year 1984 intelligence authorization, I considered offering an amendment to cut all funding for the covert action program. In a speech to the Senate on November 3, I again outlined in detail the reasons for my deep and growing opposition to a course of action I am convinced is leading the United States and its friends into a spreading regional conflict.

However, after consultations with several of my colleagues, and carefully considering the parliamentary situation, it seemed more sensible not to undermine the chances for a compromise between the House and the Senate. It was my hope that a compromise would cut back on funding for the program, and force the administration to come back to the Oversight Committees for more money. At that time, we might have learned enough to say, "No more."

That compromise is why the Senate is debating the covert action program this evening.

Now, the administration tried to do an end run around the Intelligence Committees to get further funding on an emergency basis. It does not want the committees and the Congress to give a full, careful review to the covert action program.

When the Appropriations and Intelligence Committees blocked this manuever, insisting that we follow the rules of the Senate, Secretary Shultz and CIA Director Casey sheepishly and apologetically appeared to argue for an additional $21 million.

The case they made, both for the program and for an emergency need, was as unconvincing to me as ever. This was only a cynical attempt to exploit Congress desire to pass supplementals for low-income energy assistance and food relief for starving African people.

They tied this emergency money for covert action, Mr. President, onto a bill to help people starving in Africa. That has to be the classical parliamentary nonsequitur of all times. By hooking the covert action money onto one of those truly emergency bills, the administration reasoned it could blow the $21 million for covert action right by us.

I see no positive changes in Central America as a result of covert action which justify continuation. I see nothing but further killing and destruction. I see nothing but a hardening of hatred of the United States by all Nicaraguans, not just Sandinistas. I see a strengthening of the radicals there and the influence of Cuba and the Soviet Union because the administration will not seek to negotiate a political modus vivendi with Nicaragua.

My distinguished colleague and good friend on the Intelligence Committee, Senator INOUYE, developed an approach which gained the support of the Intelligence Committee. It was adopted as a committee amendment to Senate Joint Resolution 492 by the Appropriations Committee.

This committee amendment would permit the CIA to expend $7 million in support of this program, while placing $14 million in the CIA's fund for contingencies. This would authorize and appropriate the entire $21 million the administration is seeking, but maintain a tight rein on spending.

While the administration technically would not need to seek the Intelligence Committee's approval to draw funds from the contingency reserve, in fact it has never done so without consulting us. Thus, this approach would retain some congressional oversight over the covert activity.

I understand what my friend from Hawaii is seeking to do. Clearly his approach is better than just handing over the $21 million as the administration wanted and as was first attempted in the Appropriations Committee. If I really believed it would be possible to phase the covert action program down in the way suggested by this arrangement, perhaps—just perhaps, it might make sense to follow his lead.

However, there is no evidence for believing the administration has any plan to wind this program down. Certainly, the administration has never made clear to me what the precise goals are, what realistic basis there is for ever believing such goals will be attained at any acceptable human and material cost, and how we will know when enough is enough.

Mr. President, the covert action program is only a small part of a much larger and rapidly escalating American military involvement throughout Central America. Step by step, this country is stumbling into a widening conflict, drawing in our friends and, eventually, American young men.

I will not remain silent about covert action when I see America heading for another war, this time in Central America.

For more than 3 years, we have seen this administration attempt to substitute military force and covert action for a policy of diplomacy and negotiation. Congress has gone along, giving the administration the money and the authority to pursue its goal of military victory. Now, the administration, sensing possible disaster, looks for scapegoats and suddenly appears with emergency requests for funding without any credible justification.

I cannot in good conscience support any measure which permits this covert action program in Central America to continue.

I urge my colleagues to support the Kennedy amendment terminating all funding for the covert action program in Central America.

Let us substitute a foreign policy for covert action, Mr. President. Let the administration offer a good policy to advance the interests of the United States in Central America. But let us not make ourselves look foolish by trying to do it, not with a foreign policy, but with a covert action described daily in the front pages of our papers. It is not moral. It makes no sense. And it is not going to work.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, if I could have the attention of the floor manager of the bill, I wish to make a concluding few remarks, but I would not make those just yet if there is going to be further debate. Otherwise, I am prepared to vote.

As I was saying to the floor manager of the bill, I have 3 or 4 minutes of concluding remarks. I do not know of any further speakers. I wish to make those just prior to the time of the vote or if the Senator from Alaska is going to table it I wish to make it just prior to the motion to table.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I am happy to have the Senator proceed and happy to give him some of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. No; we are prepared to move toward the vote if that is going to be the disposition. If there are going to be further speakers in opposition, then I will withhold the remainder of the time and wait.

Mr. STEVENS. It is not my intention to move to the table this amendment unless someone asks to do that. I think it is a matter that has been before the Senate before and we will vote up or down on it.

Mr. KENNEDY. All right.

Mr. President, how much time do I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield myself such time as I might use.

Mr. President, since the covert war was launched in 1981, the administration has given us at least four different rationales.

Initially, the primary justification was the interdiction of arms from Nicaragua to the insurgents in El Salvador.

Second, this was subsequently expanded to include the objectives of forcing Nicaragua to turn inward and forcing the Sandinistas to reassess their revolution and their efforts to export it into neighboring states.

Third, we were then told that the purpose of the covert action was to bring the Sandinistas to the negotiating table, to bring them to a more reasonable and less antagonistic attitude toward the whole area.

Fourth, most recently, the rationale has been expanded still further, to include bringing pluralism and free elections to Nicaragua.

Mr. President, what could be clearer than the stated intentions of those who are receiving the covert aid? This is a case of see no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil while doing evil. We are giving covert aid and the people we are giving it to state publicly their intention to overthrow the legitimate Government of Nicaragua.

What do the Contras say about their aims?

House Intelligence Committee Chairman BOLAND answered that question last year when he quoted Enrique Bermudez—leader of the main Contra force based in Honduras:

> It is not acceptable to carry out missions to interdict Cuban and Russian supply lines to El Salvador. We are Nicaraguans and our objective is to overthrow the Communists. . . .

And if there is any doubt, here is what Adolfo Calero of the Nicaraguan Democratic Front said on August 28, 1983:

> Within a year, the Nicaragua problem will have to be settled . . . we of the FDN have about 7,000 men, or about 10,000 if we include other groups we are working with. We believe there is no possibility of balance between Communist and non-Communist states in Central America. Things will have to go one way or another . . . if we don't win within a year, let the marines take care of it.

These are the facts. It is a travesty to state and deceptive to believe that our aid is being used for any other purpose. What we are doing is wrong, it is immoral, and violates the basic principles of our democracy.

I hold no brief for the Government of Nicaragua, but nothing that Government has done justifies or excuses this covert aggression by the United States.

This action is out of step with the Contadora countries, is out of step with international law and out of step with our own traditions.

The only basis for this policy is that the end justifies the means, but that has never been and should never be the policy of the United States.

I urge the Senate to adopt this amendment and end the secret war.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, if the Senator has any time, will he yield me 2 minutes?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I find myself in the most awkward position that I have ever found myself in through no fault of my own. I usually am in an awkward position because of things I do. In this case I find myself in an awkward position because of my position on the Intelligence Committee.

We are told in the Intelligence Committee, the intelligence community, and under the resolution that we are not supposed to tell folks how we vote in that committee, that we are not supposed to come out and acknowledge that we vote for or against a covert action. That is one of the arrangements in there.

We find ourselves in the position, as my friend, the Senator from Connecticut said to me some time ago. He said, "I never want to be on that committee because it is like Pac Man. Pac Man gets you."

I feel like Pac Man got me. I do not think we should be supporting this $20-some million here, whatever the exact figure is, but I am in a position because I know exactly what the President has said in his Presidential findings and because allegedly I, along with other members of the committee, know exactly what is happening, assuming they tell us the truth, I cannot comment on why that I think it is a bad idea to move forward with this aid.

And I could, as one staff member of mine suggested, just go from press reports like the things the Senator from Massachusetts who is not on the committee read.

If I were to use these press reports, then I confirm as a member of the committee the accuracy of the report and then I wonder whether or not I am, in fact, eligible to be prosecuted under the rules of the Senate that say I am not allowed to directly or indirectly disclose classified information.

This is the dumbest darned debate that I have ever been engaged in here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 3 minutes have expired.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, could I have 1 additional minute? Will the Senator from Alaska yield me an additional minute?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 2 minutes.

Mr. BIDEN. I will take the 4 minutes, if that is what they are doing.

But really and truly I mean think of the position—I am not sure why we have not had a secret session to debate this subject now because I believe if all of you knew what—boy, it sounds like the 1960's—If you knew what I knew you would know.

Well, I know the Senator from Alaska knows what I know and other members of the Intelligence Committee know what I know. I realize I am in a distinct minority. But I sure would like to be able to make the case and make the argument why the policy that is generating the requirement to fund folks we are not supposed to acknowledge we are funding in a country we are not supposed to acknowledge we are involved in should not be receiving the funding that they are allegedly receiving. Does that mean I can be prosecuted?

I mean this is crazy. This is absolutely insane, having this debate the way we are having this debate without the ability to speak on the details of the information we already have in our hands in the Intelligence Committee. And the President of the United States does not make it a lot easier.

The President of the United States actually makes it very much easier. The Senator from Delaware on the committee, and it is not the senior Senator, in fact has argued all along that this is a bad policy in the committee and been told by the rest of my colleagues on the committee and by the CIA and the administration spokespersons that the intention is not as I have read it to be, that they do not intend to do what I have been saying they intended to do. Then the President of the United States sits down and talks to the press and says he intends to do what I have been arguing for 1 year he intended to do all along, but the agency says he does not intend to do it.

I guess I should stop now before I end up saying something that I will regret or maybe saying something that would mean that I have officially confirmed classified information. I would love to be able to talk to you about it, as I would love to be able to debate the details of two different Presidential findings. But Pac Man has them. There is no way to talk about them.

Let me just say to the Senator from Connecticut, you are right. You are right on two scores. You are right on not being on the committee and you are right on opposing this money going for the purposes that is allegedly stated here, because they "ain't" the real reasons.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I believe the last speaker would be the Senator from Montana. How much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMPSON). The Senator has 4 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield that time to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, there is a reason to adopt this amendment. A brief look at the history of American involvement in Nicaragua is appropriate and pertinent. Our involvement began in 1894, when U.S. Marines were first sent to Nicaragua by President Cleveland; 15 to 35 marines were landed in Nicaragua for approximately 1 month to protect American lives and property during a series of rebel incursions into the area around the capital city of Managua.

President Cleveland again landed some 35 marines during a period of civil unrest in 1896.

In 1898 President William McKinley landed 33 marines for a short period in response to a call from the U.S. Consul for purposes of protecting the Embassy.

In 1899, President McKinley again sent in marines in response to foreign merchants petitioning the U.S. Government to protect their businesses during antigovernment riots.

President Taft responded to a growing Nicaraguan revolution against the government by sending a 750-man provisional regiment from Philadelphia to Nicaragua. They landed in May 1910 and remained through approximately September 1910. This time they actually went into the interior of the country and fought in battles to neutralize rebel towns.

Beginning in 1912, U.S. Marines were stationed in Nicaragua almost continuously for the next 21 years. The events that led to the marine landing in 1912 started a couple of years earlier when economic problems in Nicaragua caused the conservative, pro-United States government there to apply for funds to help reorganize the country's finances. The United States supplied the money but, in return, demanded that the Nicaraguan Government place the nation's customs department, post office, national banks, mines, railways, and harbors under the control of two New York banks as a guarantee.

This increasing U.S. involvement in the internal affairs of Nicaragua provoked a liberal uprising in 1912 against the pro-United States government. At the request of the Nicaraguan Government, 1,700 marines were sent to Nicaragua by President Taft. Their numbers were shortly increased to 2,700. The combined government and U.S. troops soon captured the rebel leaders and broke the back of the revolution.

With the exception of a brief 9-month period in 1925–26, the United States maintained some type of military presence in Nicaragua from 1912 until 1933, and the presence of these troops was instrumental in keeping the conservative, pro-United States Government in power.

In the late 1920's Augusto Cesar Sandino, from whose name comes the term "Sandinista" began to rise to the leadership of the nascent revolutionary forces in Nicaragua. The guerrilla-style warfare practiced by Sandino and his some 300 followers went on throughout the late 1920's and early 1930's. Although Sandino's forces were never able to capture and hold a major town, nor could they threaten the government in Managua, the Nicaraguan forces and the U.S. Marines fighting alongside them found themselves in a war that they could not win militarily.

The U.S. Marines withdrew in January 1933 because Sandino's major condition for peace had been the departure of the marines. After the marines left, Sandino signed a peace agreement with the Nicaraguan Government. Marines have not been deployed to Nicaragua since that time. But that was not the end of our interference in Nicaraguan politics.

During the late 1920's another figure was rising to dominance who would share the next four decades of Nicaraguan history. Anastasio Somoza Garcia was rising through the ranks of the Nicaraguan National Guard.

In 1937, with U.S. backing, Somoza came to power at the head of a military regime which was to rule Nicaragua for more than 40 years, to 1979. In all, three members of the Somoza family headed the military government during this period with the backing of the United States and more than half a billion dollars in U.S. aid.

What was the final result of all this military support in Nicaragua? The eventual collapse of the Somoza dictatorship and the rise to power of the Marxist Sandinista government. Our involvement in Nicaragua in backing pro-American governments and particularly the Somoza family dictatorship resulted in antagonizing the oppressed Nicaraguans and led to even greater support for the rebel Sandanistas in Nicaragua.

We are now in El Salvador, and we are making the same mistakes we made in Nicaragua during our generations of involvement there. We have a chance to change our policies in Latin America and we should take it—now by adopting this amendment.

It is true that "history repeats itself." There is no law making us repeat bad history.

We are in the process of making law. The amendment is essential and needed and would be good law to prevent repeating bad history.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I would just point out that the request we received from the President of the United States was a request for $21 million for the Central Intelligence Agency. The letter that came from the Office of Management and Budget asked for $21 million for the Central Intelligency Agency. The discussions that my friend from Vermont have referred to have been discussions of many of us, including myself, I presume, connecting that $21 million with the cap that was in the last defense appropriations bill. The impact of that is as the Senator from Delaware said, the impact of what I have said is that we should realize that we have not acted properly in terms of the classification procedures that are before us. But we have no alternative but to respond to the attacks that are being made upon this amount of money.

I am waiting for one last word, Mr. President, as to whether one other Senator wants to speak.

Does the Senator from Nebraska wish time?

Mr. EXON. Yes; I would like some time. I would like to ask the manager of the bill a question, if I might.

Mr. STEVENS. I am happy to yield to my friend for a question.

Mr. EXON. The Senator from Nebraska has been listening to this debate and he has become thoroughly confused as to what he should do. I had made up my mind earlier that, since I oppose the overthrow of another government by convert action, I would vote against this $21 million figure. Then I listened to the debate and I listened to my friend from Delaware, who is on the Intelligence Committee. I serve on the Armed Services Committee, and I am the ranking minority member on the Strategic and Theater Nuclear Forces Subcommittee and from time to time I get briefings that are of a closely held nature.

I guess what I am saying to the manager of the bill is that I feel, with what has been said on the floor, that I might need more information. Maybe I should change my mind and vote for the $21 million, because some of the things that I have heard on the floor make me wonder. Yet I hear other people say, "No, you should not do that"—"Yes, you should." Is there a reason, on an important matter, which I think this is, is there some reason that we have not secured the Senate for a closed briefing on this matter so those of us who do not have all the information that some of the others seem to have could be informed as to how we should vote on this critical issue?

I believe that it is a critical issue because I hear some people say it is a critical issue—that you have got to do this and you have got to do that. The debate has thoroughly confused this Senator from Nebraska. I am wondering if that feeling is shared by many of my colleagues. Is there something wrong with having a closed session of the Senate so the Senate could be properly briefed on this matter and so that we would know what we are doing rather than the blind leading the blind?

Mr. STEVENS. I say to my friend that there is nothing wrong with having a closed session. We are dealing with matters that are extremely sensitive. We look to the fact that, as I said previously, this program we are talking about was cleared by the Senate on a Consent Calendar basis—I believe I am correct—2 years in a row.

As a matter of fact, in the years previous to that the Appropriations Committee did not have knowledge of some of the items that were in this area in the bill for the reason that they were classified by the previous administration at a very high level. Those of us who have looked into it have satisfied themselves this is not a program to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. A government that has over $200 million going into military construction alone, as I have said in my opinion is the most highly armed country per capita in the world today.

This is not an overthrow of government in my opinion. The Senator from Delaware disagrees. He is entitled to disagree. It has resulted in substantial change of policy in Central America. The attacks on Honduras from Nicaragua have stopped. There were attacks from Nicaragua. They have stopped. The flow of arms to El Salvadoran rebels have slowed down considerably, and there has been now a definite indication of a tendency from Nicaragua to go back to examine the commitments that it tentatively accepted in the Contadora process which included amnesty for guerrillas. It included working within the framework of the Contadora group to establish peace in the region, and to look toward demilitarization of the region. This is the pressure point concept of using this activity.

Beyond that, the simple matter is that each time this Senator has participated in a closed session he has had to run out to get to the television to hear the comments of people who have been at the closed session. We have lives at stake in this. There are people who could be seriously affected by disclosures of the information that has been made available to the Intelligence Committee, and to those of us who have handled these matters.

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator yield for further questions?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. EXON. If I understand my friend and colleague from Alaska, he is asking that I at least consider voting for the $21 million because he and others have reviewed this matter, and they are convinced that it is so profoundly in the interest of the United States of America that we should have an up and down vote on this $21 million regardless of the fact that many of us would be voting in the blind.

I ask the question: Other than the reason that you just cited, which I think is a very sad commentary on the U.S. Senate, if we cannot have a closed session here and if people cannot protect that at a closed session as we have to do from time to time, is that not a sad commentary?

Mr. STEVENS. Senator, let me make sure we understand each other. You serve on committees that get classified information. Is that right?

Mr. EXON. That is right.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senate and the people of the United States rely upon you to review that and to bring recommendations here. This Senator can never remember challenging a bipartisan finding of such a committee that it is in the national interest to proceed. The Senator from Delaware is correct. We should not get into numbers who voted for it and who did not vote for it. I can tell you as far as this floor is concerned, with knowledge that the matter was there twice, the matter has gone through a Consent Calendar, and this was adopted in voice vote in the Appropriations Committee with full knowledge of what was in it. There are a few of us who are privy. That is the procedure.

I believe that sometimes too many of us are privy to some of these concepts. You are privy to the ones that are coming to your jurisdiction. We are privy to the ones that come within our jurisdiction. I only ask you to rely upon our committee. Those people who rely upon our committee to do their job, both the Intelligence Committee and the Appropriations Committee, have refused this, and have brought it here without any opposition vote. There was opposition that was not identified. That is another matter. That is the procedure of that one committee. It was an open session in the Appropriations Committee and it was a voice vote. Anyone could have opposed it.

I urge you to think about the fact that this is not partisan. The former President certified it. The current President continued that certification, and the level of this activity is declining, I might add—I think the Senator would agree with that—on the dollar basis.

Mr. EXON. Will the Senator yield for further questions?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. EXON. The more my friend from Alaska tries to satisfy my concern, which I think he has tried to do, the higher he raises my question level. Are you saying that this is so covert that a President, who served as President 4 years ago, did something, this President did it now, and it is so highly secretive that it has never broken on the front pages of the newspaper?

Mr. STEVENS. I wish that were so, but it is not so.

Mr. BIDEN. Would the Senator yield for just a second?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the participants direct their questions to the Chair, please?

Mr. BIDEN. Yes. Will the Chair, Mr. President, be willing to listen?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. BIDEN. Fine. In that case, I will suggest to the Chair that the Senator from Nebraska raises an interesting point. The Senator from Alaska, I think well intended, may have inadvertently slightly misrepresented the situation. For example, one President, a former President, certified certain action. The second President came along and certified a similar action but issued two Presidential findings different than the first President. And the second Presidential finding was different than his—President Reagan's—first finding, neither of which I am allowed to discuss here.

Third, when our committee voted, based upon what was the interpretation of all but one of the members of the committee as to what the second Presidential finding meant, they said it means A. One Senator said no, it is clear to me it means B. They said if it meant B, we would not be for it. But we know it does not mean B. We believe it means A. So they voted. Then the President of the United States of America at a press conference says when asked, or talking to reporters, "What is your intention with the Contras?" And he said B. That is a change, since we voted, I would suggest. There was only one Senator who said he meant B.

The Senator from New York, a brilliant man, said the President cannot mean what he said because the CIA says he does not mean what he says. I am not being facetious. I am being serious. That is what was said.

What we do here is say the President may have said B, but he really meant A, because the committee said on the record, if he meant B, we are not going to agree.

Mr. STEVENS. How much time is remaining, Mr. President?

Mr. BIDEN. I know it sounds crazy, but—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time remaining is 76 minutes controlled by the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. How much time on the other side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time on the other side on this amendment has expired.

Mr. BIDEN. I am beginning to learn the ABC's here, Mr. President. I think it does not help much for me to go beyond this. The only point I would make, and I hope I have made it, is that I would argue that circumstances have changed since the Intelligence Committee voted last. I would argue that the Senator from Alaska is correct, that we must rely on bipartisan consensus of committees that have information shared with them and only in the rarest circumstance ask for a secret session.

To help my friend from Nebraska, to the extent it helps—and it might confuse him—I would say the Senator from Alaska is right not to ask for a secret session if nothing has changed since the committee voted.

I argue that things have changed since the committee voted, clarifying that the one Senator was right and the other Senators were wrong in their interpretation of what the Presidential finding meant.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I understand the ABC's, too, but I think that the place where the Senator from Delaware turns the corner from me is that he is saying he has interpreted a statement, and the President has. When the majority leader arrives, I believe that will be taken care of.

Let me tell the Senator from Nebraska what this Senator did because of what happened in the conference committee last year. We knew this matter was coming up. I asked every member of our committee on both sides of the aisle to go to Honduras. One of the purposes was to meet with the Contra group.

We toured Honduras and we also met with the Contra group. We also had not one but two briefings in our committee, since the Intelligence Committee has acted, I might add, on the matter of the CIA activity as it relates to the Department of Defense in Honduras, to make sure we were not crossing lines.

Again I say, we have looked into this in depth, as the Senator would do. From my point of view, I see no change. I hope we will receive the letter soon.

The distinguished chairman of the Intelligence Committee can tell you about the situation. I think it is unfortunate when we get to the point that we do.

Let me tell you, without regard to classified matters, let us just talk about the farm program. I do not have any farm program in Alaska. I do not have anyone to my knowledge who receives any benefit from the farm program in Alaska. In almost 16 years I have voted for the farm programs because I rely upon the people in that committee to study the necessity of dealing with the farm program and to come to this floor and tell us what is important, what needs to be done. I check with various people from farm States to see what the attitude is. I think that is the way we do business. In the committees, we have our assigned responsibility.

I am here not because I want to be. Who wants to defend covert aid?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENS. My friend can speak because that is his business. It is not my purpose.

I do ask the Senator to accept the fact that our committee has looked into this, has taken the time to go and seek information directly as to what is going on. I am convinced it is in the highest interest of the people of the United States and of this Government to continue this program because it is bringing about a change in Nicaragua and that is what we all seek.

I yield to my friend from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not want to talk about agriculture, but I would like to make a comment.

As far as the comments of the President which appeared in the New York Times last week, we immediately got hold of the President and I talked with him at great length on Friday night, on Saturday, and on Monday night. A letter has been sent to me signed by the Secretary of State. Unfortunately, I cannot use it in an open session of the Senate because it is classified secret. But I know that the majority leader either has received a letter from the White House, or will receive one shortly, describing exactly what the President's position is on this matter.

We first came across this issue when the Senator from New York called it to my attention last Thursday. We immediately got in touch with the White House because we realized that if the interpretation of his words in the Times were to be used in the Congress, it could have a serious effect upon this whole program.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. COHEN. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, I was not on the floor last Thursday afternoon when Senators MOYNIHAN, INOUYE, and DURENBERGER were discussing U.S. policy toward Nicaragua and the conditions placed by the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence on covert aid to the Contras. But as I heard their remarks in my office, I found myself fully in agreement with what they were saying and concluded that I should join them in speaking here on this important issue.

The covert aid issue is a difficult, a troubling, one. Those of us on the Intelligence Committee have been wrestling with it for some time. We have come from many points of view, from many perspectives, but we have sought common ground. The recent 14 to 0 vote reflects our commitment to reaching consensus decisions, ones we can support in a bipartisan manner.

Chairman GOLDWATER and Vice Chairman MOYNIHAN deserve the highest praise for the leadership they have shown in the area. And I want to give particular credit to Senator INOUYE, whose guidance and inspiration have provided the legislative vehicle which we are considering here today.

I endorse this measure which we are debating today—and I endorse the Intelligence Committee's recommendation. But I feel I must emphasize to my colleagues my growing concern that the administration is paying insufficient heed to the strong reservations and restrictions laid out by the Intelligence Committee.

Since I joined the Intelligence Committee a year ago, the covert aid issue has been the preeminent one which has confronted us. While our sessions are closed I believe I must make clear that many of us have, as we debated this issue, expressed the gravest of reservations over how the money would be spent.

Both the Senate and House Intelligence Committees have approved the use of covert aid for purposes of interdicting the flow of arms from Nicaragua to those seeking to overthrow the governments of neighboring countries. This is a valid purpose, for the Sandinistas themselves have stated flatly that they are intent on exporting revolution throughout Central America. In fact, one of the Sandinista leadership's senior members, Department of the Interior chief Thomas Borge, has said that President Reagan was correct in suggesting that this was their intention.

Last May, the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence stated, "(The insurgency in El Salvador) depends for its lifeblood—arms, ammunition, financing, logistics, command-and-control facilities—upon outside assistance from Nicaragua and Cuba." Last week it was reported that half of the weapons used by Salvadoran rebels were captured or acquired from that country's soldiers. The other half of the rebels' weapons, and about 80 percent of their ammunition, comes in from Nicaragua, according to intelligence community estimates.

It is for this reason that the Intelligence Committee has, on a bipartisan, consensus basis, supported the continuation of covert assistance. But let me emphasize again, that we approved that aid only after establishing clear limitations concerning the purposes for which it could be used. In fact, we secured from the administration a new Presidential finding, delivered last September 20, which included more precise and more limited goals than the ones we had been briefed on earlier. That Presidential finding provided the basis for the redefined program which received committee approval last fall.

It has been and continues to be, my belief that the covert assistance should not be used for efforts to overthrow the government or to attack the economic infrastructure of the country. We should not condone acts aimed at destroying powerplants, bridges and the like.

Mr. President, I think I had a firsthand glimpse of how this proscription was being ignored. Last fall, my colleague, Senator HART, and I visited Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Honduras. Our plane was an hour outside of Managua when we received word that we would have to divert to Honduras because the Managua airport was under attack.

Later that day, when we finally arrived in Nicaragua—the second plane in after the bombing—we were shown documents recoverd from the attacking plane which could lead to no other conclusion but that the individuals involved had received some sort of outside assistance.

That attack was followed soon thereafter by explosions at oil refineries in Nicaragua. And we have read regularly of other attacks against economic targets, most recently the mining of harbors.

One can argue that the mining is also aimed at interrupting the flow of supplies or ammunition going into El Salvador. That case can probably be made. But I want to say that I am troubled by such actions, and I think many of my colleagues who are speaking here today are also troubled by them. They do not seem to be consistent with the restrictions which have consistently been outlined by both the Senate and House Intelligence Committees as we have authorized covert assistance to Nicaraguan Contras.

What has troubled me further is that our Government has not, in my view, followed through on its stated goals toward Nicaragua. We have said that we want the Nicaraguans to schedule elections, to reduce Cuban influence in their country, to stop the export of revolution to their neighbors, and to ease their restrictions against the press and opposition groups within their country.

I share the skepticism about the good faith of the Sandinista regime, but one cannot deny that they did, last fall, take a number of initial steps which were directed toward our concerns.

Clearly, the steps taken were insufficient—they were not anywhere near sufficient—but it is also clear that we can exercise greater diplomatic efforts to bring about the desired goals. Rather than rejecting the initiatives made by the Sandinistas, we should seek to expand them so that they conform to the promises they made as the very basis of the revolution. We should permit them to demonstrate that they are willing to reduce Cuban influence. We should give them a chance to show that they will not export their revolution to Costa Rica, Honduras, El Salvador and the other countries of Central America.

If, every time the Sandinistas take a step, we tell them it is not enough and simply continue the bombing, we can never hope to have any positive influence on them. And if we continue to provide open-ended assistance to those seeking to overthrow them, we will continue to sow the seeds of mistrust within their government and with their people. Further, we will only harden the views of the most strident members of the ruling body and reduce our chances of winning the confidence of those who are more moderate.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. COHEN. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. I want to make sure the Senate and the Senator understand that this is not an open-ended appropriation. Of the $21 million, $7 million is available immediately. The other $14 million is available only under the reserve contingencies and can be obligated only under the statutory procedures, and the Senator and I know what they are in terms of clearances with the Intelligence Committees. So there is nothing open ended. It is not even $21 million. It is $7 million subject to the control of our committees.

I urge the Senator to understand that we have followed, and I congratulate the Senator for his statement, we have followed that procedure. We are trying to have the control exerted by the Intelligence Committee on this matter and not here, on the floor.

Mr. COHEN. I understand that, Mr. President. What I am saying is that it is coming to a very fine line between interrupting or interdicting the flow of arms and making a wholesale attack upon their economic infrastructure.

We must not forget that our record of intervention in the internal affairs of Nicaragua dates back to 1909. From 1912 to 1933, with an interruption of only 18 months, U.S. Marines were stationed in Nicaragua. And our Government helped bring Anastasio Somoza to power—and to keep him and his sons in power until the Sandinistas succeeded in their revolution in 1979. There is, as was made clear to Senator HART and me when we visited Managua, a deep-seated mistrust of the United States. With the record I have just cited, that mistrust is understandable.

I do not say that we should reverse our policy of working for an end to Nicaraguan efforts to destabilize their neighbors. I support the effort to terminate that. And I do not say we should lose our healthy skepticism toward some of the actions they have taken or have said they will take. What I do say, though, is that we should press on with our diplomatic efforts with greater intensity. And we should recognize that the direction we take may have long-lasting repercussions, not only for Nicaragua and its neighbors, but for our Nation as well.

We have legitimate fears about the expressed goals of the Sandinista leadership—namely the export of revolution to their neighboring countries. And I think the Sandinistas have much to fear from us. We are a powerful nation, and they know that we have a great interest in what happens in this hemisphere and that we will do what we can to protect our interests here. They also know that we will resist any effort which perceive on the part of the Soviets to interfere in this hemisphere's affairs.

With this in mind, I simply want to say today that I would hope we would all emphasize our commitment to the language we included last year in the Intelligence Authorization Act when we approved the covert aid for Nicaragua. In that measure, we stated that the President should work through the Organization of American States, using "all diplomatic means at his disposal * * * to seek resolution of the conflicts in Central America based on the provisions of the Final Act of the San Jose Conference of October 1982 especially principles * * * relating to nonintervention in the internal affairs of other countries * * *"

We stated further: "The United States should support measures at the Organization of American States, as well as efforts of the Contadora group, which seek to end support for terrorist, subversive, or other activities aimed at the violent overthrow of the governments of countries in Central America."

Mr. President, I think this is a worthy goal. It is the best approach we can take as we seek a resolution of the conflict in Central America. Let us give the Contadora process a chance to work. That process will succeed only if we provide it the fullest support and work in good faith for a diplomatic solution.

I really do hope that we are going to have the fullest attention directed toward our foreign policy in this region as it is developed. If we are going to stabilize the region, we have to seek long-term economic and diplomatic solutions, not military ones.

Mr. President, I must reiterate my concern here tonight: I am concerned that the administration has not been paying enough attention to the very strict restrictions we have placed upon the type of activity that could be performed in order to encourage the Sandinistas to come to the bargaining table, in order to interdict the flow of supplies, and in order to promote the Contadora process. What I am concerned about is that we are ignoring the Contadora process, while the Contras turn loose the attacks on the economic infrastructure. If that escalates, it is going to be in direct violation of the restrictions established by the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, let me assure the Senator that, in the briefings we received, the justifications for the moneys that were sought were on the basis of the comments that he has just made. There was no indication that we are trying to overthrow a government by virtue of this expenditure. In the first place, I think it would be ludicrous to think it would be possible to overthrow that government with even a $21 million expenditure, and this is just $7 million.

Second, we are looking toward a return to the Contadora process and to the concept of trying to fulfill the goals of that process, particularly with regard to the amnesty for the guerrillas and to the demilitarization of borders in that area.

It was our finding that, as a result of this activity, the attacks on Honduras have ceased, that the flow of arms into El Salvador has decreased, and that we are in the situation now where we want the Sandinistas to agree to the multilateral negotiations and particularly the 21 objectives of the Contadora group.

We have had no indication at all that there was any attempt to bring about a foreign policy based upon military activities. On the contrary, the problem there, in the first place, was that it appeared that the Soviet-Cuban armament in Nicaragua was growing so fast that they were literally starting to export it before they themselves had examined what they were doing in terms of their own foreign policy, whether they were going to become the Soviet-Cuban force on the land mass of this hemisphere.

We believe there have been indications that they are reexamining their policy. I think that these objectives, which are essential to our national security, ought to be met by this program. It is a program that is continuing under the guidelines that the Senator has mentioned, to the best of my knowledge. I have not seen any finding that has been described in our briefings. There has been no such finding described to me.

Mr. COHEN. The only point I want to make is that if we are going to hold the bipartisan consensus we have had to date—and if the Intelligence Committee is to have credibility in coming before this body in an open session with its recommendation on the basis of our closed sessions—then we are going to have to insist that the administration strictly follow those guidelines. All I am suggesting is that, as these attacks continue to escalate and come closer to being attacks upon economic sites—be they bridges, power stations or other means of internal domestic support—then we are coming very dangerously close, I believe, to violating those restrictions and falling into the same trap, I believe, that the El Salvadoran guerrillas are falling into by destroying economic targets and turning the people against them. I think we are going to run that same risk. If the direction is to undermine economic activities of Nicaragua, I think we are making a very bad mistake. So I hope that this will send a message of some sort to the administration that we mean what we say.

Mr. STEVENS. We have had no indication whatsoever that any portion of this program was aimed at the economic situation in Nicaragua. To the contrary.

Mr. COHEN. I do not know what you call the Managua Airport.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will direct the question to the Chair, please.

Mr. COHEN. I would say to the President, I do not know what you call the Managua Airport. I was there, and that seemed to me to be an attack on an economic target. I am supporting what the committee is doing, but I am also raising a warning sign that we ought to adhere to what the committee has laid down. Failure to do so runs the risk in the future of not having the support either by the full Senate or, indeed, by a bipartisan consensus of the Intelligence Committee itself.

Mr. BIDEN. Will the Senator from Alaska yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS. I would be happy to yield to my friend.

Mr. BIDEN. My question is, assume that the President's and the Congress desire for the Nicaraguans to stop being involved in the export of arms and bring about proposals that the Contadora group has outlined, assume that they were prepared to do that. Does the Senator suggest that if they are prepared to do that, we in this Congress and the President should stop supporting at that point the Contras? Is that what the Senator is saying?

Mr. STEVENS. I did not say that.

Mr. BIDEN. I am asking the Senator.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me give the Senator an assumption. Let us assume that there are troops and tanks of—let us go back to the ABC's—of country A poised on the border of country B, and they are actually making incursions into the countryside of country B; that there are forces going from country A into country C and carrying large amounts of military supplies, and it is determined that there ought to be some way to try and deter those forces from doing that. And one of the ways is to draw their attention to the vulnerability of their port or activities in other areas where maybe their military ought to be if it is truly a defensive military.

Now, let us just assume that country A suddenly finds that there is a quick attack against an airfield, and they suddenly redeploy their armed forces so that they are in fact defensive and the attacks on country B stop, some of the arms going into country C stop flowing into country C. Now, is the Senator asking me whether there is something wrong with that?

Mr. BIDEN. No, no, I am with the Senator. So far, I am supportive. Now, what happens when they stop? What happens when they pull their tanks back from country B and they stop sending the arms into country C but those folks we have been giving arms to, who are taking care of the port and taking care of all the other infrastructure, say, "We want to keep going, we want to go on to the capital of Xanadu." And we say, "No, wait a minute, our objective has been met. Your objective and ours is different. You want to go take the capital. All we want is them to stop mucking around in country A and B."

Mr. STEVENS. Let me answer that question because, as I said, I went down and talked to those people personally.

Mr. BIDEN. In Xanadu?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Please direct your questions to the Chair.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the distinguished Member in the Chair. Mr. President, let me point out that we went down to talk to the Contras and what did we find? We found that they are people who are operating basically on their feet. They have no equipment. They have a couple of fast boats, small boats. They have no aircraft. They had at least one I think on one occasion. But basically we found they were a dissident group operating within their own country by the way, according to the information we found. And under those circumstances they were in fact providing the kind of pressure that would result in the assumption I told the Senator about.

We have difficulty in describing exactly what we were told, as does the Senator, but again, Mr. President, let me say to my friend that there is no indication that the flow of arms into El Salvador has stopped. There is no indication that were this counterforce to be disbanded, the attacks on Honduras would not resume. As a matter of fact, to the contrary, in the time since we first raised this matter last December, the briefings that we have had have indicated the Soviets have provided what amounts to another battalion of tanks. Last year we were told there was evidence they were trying to have a sufficient number to have two battalions. This year we are told unquestionably there are at least three battalions of tanks there. Now, those tanks were the things that were parked on the border of Honduras.

The interesting thing is no other nation down there has tanks, Mr. President. No other nation has them. Honduras does not have them, Costa Rica does not have them, El Salvador does not have them. It is supposed to be a defensive army.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. BIDEN. I am not disagreeing with anything the Senator from Alaska just said.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alaska maybe misunderstood my question. Is there a point at which we in the Senate and the House and the President are prepared to say, "Your goals, which are clearly stated by the Contras, are now divergent from our goals, and although we have brought you this far, you can keep going but with no more American money"?

Mr. STEVENS. When the Government of Nicaragua goes back to the Contadora process and supports the objectives of those 21 points, which at one time it indicated it would support—and the Senator would realize that we have done our best to have them positively address the concerns of their neighbors—then I am certain that this Senator would say, if they addressed the concerns of those neighbors, if they stopped increasing their military strength, their aggressive military strength, if they in fact cut back on the dedication of their funds—and the Senator from Maine worries about their economy. The indication we have is that they are diverting so much of their own money into their military their economy must slip automatically—if we would have an end to the subversion they have undertaken in terms of that area and we could receive the assurances from Costa Rica, from Honduras, and from El Salvador that the 21 points were being pursued, then this Senator would say there is no reason for pressure on that country.

I ask the Senator to tell me why there should be 14 to 18 attack helicopters in Nicaragua since last year. What are they there for?

All we are saying is that this group keeps those people under a pressure that at least makes them consider the advisability of becoming part of the peaceful Contradora process and not becoming the aggressive arm of the Soviet-Cuban group in terms of its goals in this hemisphere.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I say two things.

No. 1, I am sure the Senator from Alaska and other Senators know that if, in fact, the point is reached where they would sign on the 21 points and be assured by their neighbors that they had, we would let a lot of people out there to hang out and dry.

Mr. STEVENS. Part of the 21 points is amnesty for guerrillas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address their questions to the Chair.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, that assumes that those guerrillas are going to say, "Amnesty is enough for me. I like this regime."

No. 2, one of the reasons one could argue—and I acknowledge that I am not certain—why there is a need for 14 attack helicopters is that it is probably not too unreasonable for Nicaraguans, if you were in their spot, bad as they are, and they are bad, to think that maybe, just maybe——

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this is my time, and I should like the Senator to answer any questions, if we are going to get to this point.

The real problem is that we seem to ignore this question of what that Soviet-Cuban force is in Nicaragua for. The Senator has had the briefings.

Mr. BIDEN. I am going to answer, Mr. President.

It could be there because it wants to be a juggernaut to push up on to Mexico, some say. But it also could be there because they figured out, since in the last several months when they acquired those helicopters, in the meantime there have been 5,000 Americans in a permanent base put on their border—they might say, "Wait a minute. Do you think these guys are going to invade us?"

I know that is kind of silly, but if I were there, I might think, outrageous as it sounds, that maybe the United States was going to invade my country. I might think—and I am not saying the United States is involved in it—that because my harbor is mined, somebody wants to do something bad to me. I might think that because of the fact that there is an attempt, and a direct attempt, to undermine the economic infrastructure, not merely by their diverting moneys for their armament but by actions of the Contra, maybe somebody was coming to get me. That could be an explanation. I am not saying it is, but it could be.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the unfortunate part is that the remarks of the Senator from Delaware will be printed in Managua tomorrow, and mine, which will be that no rational person in Nicaragua could think that, will never be.

The problem with this debate is that we have never been aggressive against Nicaragua in this period. The Contra activity started long after the overwhelming buildup and the attacks on Honduras and the flow of arms into El Salvador. They started after we intercepted the two large C-130's in Brazil, marked "medical supplies," going directly into Managua. For years, there was covert activity on the part of the Soviets on taking that equipment into Nicaragua, and finally we exposed their hand.

Mr. BIDEN. I agree.

Mr. STEVENS. We have not attacked them. We have not given them any reason to believe that we are going to attack them. We are not aggressive. We have not returned to gunboat diplomacy. We are in the process of providing $7 million, which, in terms of an operation of 8,000 people in the field, at the most, is about a 30-day allowance.

What is aggressive about this in terms of our announced purpose, which is, to Nicaragua, "Go back to the Contadora 21 points. Go back to the peaceful process. Do not be seduced into becoming the Soviet-Cuban pawn in this hemisphere, and do not believe that you can get away with the concept of bringing that force across your borders."

All we have done is serve notice on them: "That force will never leave your borders." So far as this Senator is concerned, the Senate ought to say that loud and clear. That Soviet-Cuban force must remain in Nicaragua.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I agree completely. If it comes across the border, we should interdict it. I am not arguing that.

I am suggesting that this process was started before the Nicaraguans started it. I am not in a chicken-and-egg argument. I was answering the direct question of the Senator: Why were the attack helicopters coming in? Could there be an explanation for it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. BIDEN. I thank the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, the Select Committee on Intelligence voted on March 13 to authorize an additional $7 million for support of military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. The supplemental appropriations bill reported by the Appropriations Committee reflects the action of the Intelligence Committee. Both committees have also agreed that another $14 million should be allocated to the reserve for contingencies administered by the Director of Central Intelligence. The Intelligence Committee expects to review any request for release of these funds from the contingency reserve.

There is a consensus in the Intelligence Committee that further support for the Nicaragua operations requires the closest congressional oversight scrutiny. This strict control insures that the President and the Secretary of State make the decisions and bear direct responsibility for the continued use of force against a government with which the United States maintains diplomatic relations.

These decisions have serious implications for the ability of the United States to promote adherence to the principles of international law in the conduct of world affairs. As a government and as a people, we should oppose the tactics of guerrilla warfare and terrorist violence as instruments of the policy of any nation. Only the most extraordinary and compelling circumstances should justify departure from that principle.

For the past 2 years, we have had to face the fact that our Government was supporting, through CIA channels, the use of paramilitary violence in Nicaragua. Both the House and Senate Intelligence Committees have struggled to exercise their oversight duties properly and effectively on this issue.

At the outset there were grounds for a limited policy of support for groups opposed to the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua, because of evidence that the Sandinistas, in collaboration with Cuba and the Soviet Union, were providing support for guerrilla warfare in El Salvador. Interference by Nicaragua in the affairs of its neighbor violated the principles of international law. Our action could be justified as a means to counter these Nicaraguan activities.

It became clear early on, however, that the objectives of U.S. policy were ill-defined and potentially broader. For that reason, both Intelligence Committees agreed to impose a restriction against the use of funds for any operation having as its purpose either the overthrow of the Nicaraguan Government or the provocation of hostilities between Nicaragua and Honduras. Congress enacted this prohibition into law in 1982.

Shortly thereafter, members of both Intelligence Committees visited Central America and returned to express doubts about compliance with this restriction. The groups receiving U.S. support had as their objective the overthrow of the Sandinista government, and the United States could not entirely avoid responsibility for their efforts.

The two committees responded differently to these developments in 1983. The majority of the House committee decided that support for the use of force in Nicaragua was no longer justified, and the House endorsed this position by passing legislation to prohibit further expenditures for such military or paramilitary operations.

The Senate select committee expressed its dissatisfaction with the program by voting not to authorize additional funds unless the President submitted a new finding, as required by law for any CIA covert action, and the select committee had an opportunity to review that finding. The select committee's action required the President's personal reassessment of U.S. objectives.

The new finding submitted and approved by the select committee last fall provided more carefully defined objectives designed to be linked to diplomatic efforts to reach a negotiated resolution of the differences between the United States and Nicaragua. On the basis of that finding, the Senate approved limited funds with a procedure for the select committee to review any request for additional resources.

In conference, the positions of the House and Senate were reconciled by imposing a $24 million ceiling on funds for fiscal year 1984. It was clearly recognized that, if operations continued at their previous level, such funds would not be sufficient for the entire fiscal year and supplemental funding by Congress would be necessary.

The President's current request for supplemental funds of $21 million has not been fully endorsed by the select committee. Only $7 million has been approved for the operation, with a possibility for use of an additional $14 million after review by the select committee.

This action should require the President and the Secretary of State to reassess once again the necessity for the Nicaragua operation in light of its objectives and contribution to the diplomatic efforts that must be the primary focus of U.S. policy in Central America. The members of the select committee have attempted to maintain a bipartisan consensus on this issue, not because all of us necessarily agree with every aspect of the President's policy, but because we believe that sensitive CIA operations should not be politicized.

There are serious questions as to whether, or under what circumstances, the United States is justified in supporting the use of military or paramilitary force in a country that poses no direct threat to the United States. These questions should be considered from the point of view of our Nation's fundamental values and interests, not as a matter of partisan political advantage.

There are legitimate grounds for concern that U.S. diplomatic efforts to resolve our differences with Nicaragua have not had the same priority as the use and threat of force. To the extent that operations against Nicaragua become divorced from serious U.S. diplomatic negotiations, they lose their justification.

Therefore, I have supported the action of the Select Committee on Intelligence to restrict funding and require stringent oversight review procedures for the Nicaragua operation.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the distinguished majority leader such time as he may require.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I might offer a word of explanation for the delay. Earlier today, the President of the United States called me on the telephone to authorize me to say certain things in respect to our policy in Nicaragua. That has been reduced to writing in a letter that I now have from the President addresed to me and dated this date.

I have discussed this with the distinguished Senator from New York, with the distinguished Senator from Hawaii, with the distinguished chairman of the Intelligence Committee, with the manager of the bill, and other Senators. The issue grew out of an interview with the President in the New York Times recently. Perhaps I should read the letter in its entirety, for I feel that it is largely self-explanatory.

APRIL 4, 1984.

DEAR HOWARD: There have been questions resulting from my March 29, interview in the New York Times and whether our policy toward Nicaragua has changed.

The fact is, no change has occurred. The United States does not seek to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua; nor to impose or compel any particular form of government there.

We are trying, among other things, to bring the Sandinistas into meaningful negotiations and constructive, verifiable agreements with their neighbors on peace in the region.

We believe that a pre-condition to any successful negotiations in these regards is that the Government of Nicaragua cease to involve itself in the internal or external affairs of its neighbors, as required of member nations of the OAS.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Could I ask the majority leader what he understands by the clause "among other things" in the third paragraph: "We are trying, among other things, to bring the Sandinistas into meaningful negotiations and constructive, verifiable agreements with their neighbors on peace in the region."

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am happy to do that. As the Senator from New York knows, as vice chairman of the Intelligence Committee, there are certain matters that are dealt with on a sensitive and classified basis. I am authorized by the President to say that the "among other things" means those matters included in the Presidential finding of September 19, and nothing more.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. Does the majority leader understand this statement of policy to be anything different from what the administration is doing at the present time?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I really cannot comment on that. I am not a member of the Intelligence Committee, except as an ex officio member. I have not kept up with the details of this matter.

I can represent, as I have to the Senate and to the Senator from New York, that this is meant to bring into absolute coincidence the Presidential finding submitted to the Intelligence Committee and the policy of this Government as acknowledged by the President in this letter.

Now, the "among other things" statement is meant to be nothing more than those things included in the Presidential finding. It does not extend it; it does not reduce it. It is precisely the same material included in that classified document.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, that is the understanding that the committee had when we included this money in the bill, and it was the understanding when the matter was first called to my attention. My help was sought in trying to get this money for this year.

I would yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I think a bit of history on this might be illuminating.

About this time last year—it may have been a little longer—one of the members of the Intelligence Committee, following what the House had done, moved to make any decisions in Central America overt instead of covert. If a vote had been taken at the approximate time that it was introduced, it had a very good chance of passage. The vote that we had was objected to by the intelligence family, the President, and the State Department, now understandably so. We told Mr. Casey of the CIA to inform the President that we requested he write us a letter restating his position on Central America because some of the Members were, frankly, not sure of what his position was about September 23—I think that was the date last year—such a statement came from the President. It was read to the entire committee. The committee, I believe, unanimously accepted it. There were two dissenting votes.

That removed the danger that we faced in having to make a decision on the motion to go overt, which meant war and leave covert. That, I think, is correct. I ask my cochairman if that is not correct.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. That is my understanding, Mr. President.

Mr. President?

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the distinguished majority leader accurately reflected my understanding. I have been authorized by the senior Senator from Hawaii, Mr. INOUYE, to say that it comports with his understanding.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, so that the record may be complete, I ask unanimous consent that a passage from the New York Times, an interview with President Reagan, which has been referred to, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the document was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Excerpt from New York Times, Mar. 29, 1984]

AN INTERVIEW WITH PRESIDENT REAGAN ON CAMPAIGN ISSUES

Q. About Central America, Mr. Prsident. I wonder if I could ask you to explain or justify how the United States can go about assisting people who are as you called them, freedom fighters, who are seeking to overthrow a Government that we have diplomatic relations with and answer, if you could, critics who are worried that this is increasing our involvement in Central Americal.

A. Well, the answer to that is, first of all, this particular Government of Nicaragua is a government that was set up by force of arms and the people have never chosen it. It's a revolutionary government. And that Government, in violation of its pledge to us at a time when it was a revolutionary force trying to become a government, had promised that it would not aid the guerrillas in El Salvador who are attempting to overthrow a duly elected goverment and a democratic government. And they have violated that. The guerrillas are literally being directed from bases near Managua. They're being supplied by that Government. And the other factor, why I have referred to them on occasion as freedom fighters, is because many of them are elements of the same revolution that put the Sandinista Government in force.

The revolution against the Somoza dictatorship and our Government, under the previous Administration, sat back and never lifted a finger on behalf of Somoza and then when the fighting was over did start to give financial aid to the revolutionary government to help it install itself. And had to cancel that when it discovered what that government was doing. During the revolution against Somoza, the revolutionaries appealed to the Organization of American States, of which we are a member also, to ask Somoza to step down and end the bloodshed. And the Organization of American States asked for a statement of what were the goals of the revolution. And they were provided: Democracy, a pluralistic government, free elections, free labor unions, freedom of the press, human rights observed—those were the goals of the revolution, submitted in writing to the Organization of American States.

FOLLOWED PATTERN OF CASTRO

After they got in, they followed the pattern that was followed by Castro in Cuba. Those other elements, who were not Sandinista, other groups who wanted and they thought all of the same thing, democracy. To rid themselves of a dictatorship. Those elements were denied participation in the government. Arrests were made. There were some who were exiled and there were some, I'm afraid, who were executed. And many of the people now fighting as so-called Contras are elements of the revolution. And it is less an overthrow that they're fighting for as it is a demand that they be allowed to participate in the government and that the government keep its promises as to what it had intended for the people.

And I see no dichotomy in our supporting the Government, the democratic government of El Salvador and the Contras here—and we made it plain to Nicaragua—made it very plain that this would stop when they keep their promise and restore the democratic rule and have elections. Now, they've finally been pressured, the pressure's led them to saying they'll have an election. I think they've scheduled it for next November. But there isn't anything yet to indicate that that election will be anything but the kind of rubber stamp that we see in any totalitarian government. There aren't any rival candidates, there aren't any rival parties and how would they campaign without a free press?

Q. Well, that's a good note for us to close on. Thank you very much, Mr. President.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter from the President, dated April 4, 1984, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 4, 1984.

Hon. HOWARD BAKER,
Majority Leader, U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR HOWARD: There have been questions resulting from my March 29, interview in the New York Times and whether our policy toward Nicaragua has changed.

The fact is, no change has occurred. The United States does not seek to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua; nor to impose or compel any particular form of government there.

We are trying, among other things, to bring the Sandinistas into meaningful negotiations and constructive, verifiable agreements with their neighbors on peace in the region.

We believe that a pre-condition to any successful negotiations in these regards is that the Government of Nicaragua cease to involve itself in the internal or external affairs of its neighbors, as required of member nations of the OAS.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield back the balance of our time.

I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have already been ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, would the floor manager yield? Our time expired 1½ hours ago. It will take only a couple of minutes to inquire of the floor manager of the bill.

Can the floor manager of the bill, having read this letter to this body, indicate how, if at all, this letter is going to alter and change what is currently happening, What are the Contras doing in Nicaragua? Or, is this a restatement?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I do not yield further.

I expressed in my opinion what it states, and the conditions under which the appropriations were brought before the body. It is not a change in policy, in my opinion. It confirms the policy that has been challenged by those who oppose the amendment.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask for 3 minutes on the bill. I yield myself 3 minutes on the bill.

Mr. President, we have had an hour-and-a-half on the floor. We were ready to debate this for the 4 hours.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, we have had 4 hours. I have not yielded it to the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, am I recognized?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, does the Senator control the time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I want to indicate we have a lot more amendments to consider. If we are going to take a Member of the Senate off the floor, we will have plenty of time to talk.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr President, I am not taking the Senator off the floor. I have yielded the Senator and his side half of the time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Senator from Alaska has not yielded to the proponent of the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have yielded.

Mr. KENNEDY. Not to me. You did not. It happens to be my amendment and Senator BINGAMAN's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts has the floor for 2 more minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Chair.

I do not know whether I can get a response, Mr. President, in the final few moments of debate on this amendment. I understand that the Senator from Connecticut will have one that will relate to the subject.

The question which I have before we vote—having been given the letter of the President of the United States—is whether as a result of the statement of the President of the United States there is going to be anything different as regards the activity of the Contras. If there is nothing that is going to be different from what is happening at the present time, then it seems to me that all the reasons that have been debated earlier over the last 4 hours still stand. And I would hope that the amendment would be accepted.

If there is a difference, I would hope that we would hear from the opponents of this amendment regarding what change there will be. If there is none, I hope we would get support for this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS) would vote "nay."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) and the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) are absent on official business.

On this vote, the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART) is paired with the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG).

If present and voting, the Senator from Colorado would vote "yea" and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 61, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 52 Leg.]

So the amendment (No. 2843) was rejected.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have sought recognition to inquire of the distinguished majority leader what the program is for the rest of the day and for the rest of the week if he is prepared to state that.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the minority leader. I regret that I must respond by saying I think we have to go on a while tonight. I hope that we shall be able to finish the so-called Central America amendments tonight. There are a number of them. The Dodd amendment; I believe the Senator from Connecticut is prepared to go forward with his amendment. There is a 2-hour limitation on that. I entertain the hope that we can do it in less time than that.

The Levin amendment, I am told, is perhaps next. There is a 1-hour time limitation on that.

Another Central America amendment that we are aware of and that is included in the unanimous-consent agreement is the Sasser amendment dealing with Honduras bases, on which there is a 4-hour time limitation. I believe that is the crop on Central America.

In addition to that, however, we have a Chiles amendment dealing with the budget. I would like to finish all of that tonight if we can, but it is now almost 9 p.m. I am not sure how much of it we can do, but I hope we can get through the Central America side of it and leave us tomorrow to deal with the other amendments that must be dealt with. Unless the Senator from Florida and the Senator from New Mexico—I see the Senator from Florida next to me at the moment. If he is willing to stay——

Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I might say to the distinguished leader that I keep hoping that I am not ever going to have to bring up my amendment, that it will be moot and maybe the leader will say something tonight or tomorrow that will make that moot. I certainly would not want to prejudice that statement that he might make by precipitately bringing up this amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator. I do not know exactly what words I could say that would bring about that happy result, but maybe if I can figure them out, I will see if we can say them.

Mr. CHILES. I think if he told the Budget Committee to follow the budget law and start doing its business, that would certainly suffice for anything I would want to do on this bill.

Mr. BAKER. I was hoping the Senator had something else in mind.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I was just going to see if we could narrow this colloquy down to some idea as to what the hour might be when the majority leader would be willing to have the Senate go out tonight.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I think we ought to get into the Dodd amendment and see how we get along and see what we can do with the one after that. As I said earlier, I would like to get Dodd, Levin, and Sasser tonight if it is possible. If the minority leader will permit, I suggest that we go ahead with the Dodd amendment and see how much time that takes.

Now, the minority leader also asked me about the plans for the rest of the week. Let me respond to that as best I can.

I think it is urgently important that we try to finish the supplemental bill this week, tomorrow if possible. And I think it is possible. After that, Mr. President, I say to the minority leader I hope that we can take up the House-passed reconciliation bill which is on the calendar. That is the so-called little reconciliation bill. There are two bills on the calendar dealing with reconciliation, but I hope we can do that bill in a fairly short period of time. It would be my hope we could do that even without amendments and pass it on and leave the Senate reconciliation bill, which is also on the calendar, to be dealt with at a later time.

Now, I have told a number of Senators, and I believe I have discussed this with the minority leader—I am sure I have—that in addition to that reconciliation bill it is the intention of the leadership on this side to try to put together a budget package to follow on after the supplemental appropriations bill. I do not think of a small reconciliation bill in that context. That will stand on its own feet and have no part as far as I am concerned with the overall budget package. But it would be the hope of the leadership on this side that we can finish the supplemental tomorrow; that we can do the reconciliation bill, the small reconciliation bill, tomorrow or at the latest Friday, and that then we could proceed with other plans on how we go about trying to put together a budget package.

Now, I will also say to the minority leader that while I have been necessarily vague in describing what the steps are after the little reconciliation package, I have also indicated to him privately and I will now repeat for the record that I have no desire, no intention whatever of taking him by surprise and as soon as the strategy is developed I will share that with the minority leader so he will know exactly how we will proceed.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the majority leader. May I say, Mr. President, I have never thought that the majority leader would attempt to take me by surprise. He has never operated in that fashion and I had no idea that he would in this instance.

I wonder if the majority leader would consider making the House reconciliation bill a part of the entire package so that Senators would know then what amendment to offer to the House bill, because if they do not know what is coming in the next step, the tax bill or whatever else we are going to have to deal with, I think they would be in a better position if they knew what the whole package was going to be. Otherwise, they are a little bit at a loss, I would think—at least I would be. If I wanted to offer an amendment to the House reconciliation bill, I would be at a loss to offer this amendment or that amendment because I do not know what the rest of the package is going to be.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am reluctant to say I feel that is not practical. I hear and understand what the minority leader is saying and I am sympathetic, but I think that we have another factor to deal with in the House-passed reconciliation bill. That is there are savings in that bill which have already been passed by the House and dealt with in the Senate, and if we do not get that bill passed I am told early this month, early in April, those savings will be for naught—we will lose them—and they are $7 billion to $9 billion in savings, I am told.

So the reason for doing this is simply to preserve what we have already done and conserve those savings that have already been made. But the full range of opportunities to both sides will be available in a subsequent reconciliation bill, perhaps subsequent revenue measures and perhaps other matters as well. But I think there is an independent justification for taking up the House-passed reconciliation bill.

Mr. CHILES. If the majority leader might yield, I want to reiterate the statement of the minority leader that at least we ought be able to review the package. The majority leader has said he is not going to take us by surprise and we appreciate that. But if we have to deal with the House-passed reconciliation bill first without even having a chance to view the rest of the package, I want to tell the majority leader I do not think we will be saving any time that way. I think it might take us a lot more time because we are left with no alternative, not knowing what is going to come next and what we are going to be faced with, than to say we have to do everything to sort of protect ourselves or to do things we would be interested in that maybe we would have to do over again

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Florida but let me simply say this. There will be no shortage of opportunities for everybody to do whatever it is they want to do on the budget packages, on tax bills, on reconciliation, and all the rest. I could not stop Senators if I wanted to stop Senators and I do not want to. As the Senator from Florida knows, I have offered opportunities from a procedural standpoint for packages to be offered on the Democratic side as well as alternative packages to be offered on the Republican side.

Mr. President, if we do not deal with that House-passed reconciliation bill by, I am told, April 14, we are going to lose $8 billion. And I do not think we ought to stand by and see that happen.

Now, let me say that it is 9 o'clock at night and I would be glad to discuss this at length and extensively with the Senator from Florida and the minority leader or anybody else, but it is my fervent hope that having now responded to the minority leader on what the program is we can get on with these amendments because it is going to take us a while to try to do that.

Mr. CHILES. I do not want to take any time to delay. I really think that the majority leader has been misinformed. I do not think April 14 is a critical date. I think we are talking about the end of April.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, maybe so but in any event we have a time schedule. Mr. President, I want to get on with the business but I first want to yield to my friend and colleague from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH).

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the majority leader. I shall take only 20, 30, 40 seconds. Before asking the question, I believe that the membership, regardless of the aisles on which we sit, are understandable always of the leadership, both Republican and Democratic, in being fair with all the Members of this body.

Is there a possibility—and I know several Senators are involved in what I am now posing as a question—that perhaps we could go in earlier on Friday than maybe anticipated so that at least in the middle to the later afternoon we might close the discussions and possibly voting?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am anxious to finish Friday. I have things I want to do and need to do Friday afternoon and Saturday, as I know other Senators do, but on Monday of this week I indicated that we need to finish the supplemental, we need to get on to the budget matter, at least with the small reconciliation bill, and that Senators should be on notice of the possibility of later evenings any night this week, a session on Friday, and a session on Saturday. I am afraid that is still the situation. I regret to say that, Mr. President, and I do understand the concern the Senator from West Virginia has and I respect it, but I am afraid I only have bad news tonight.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I see the Senator from Connecticut on the floor. I yield in the hope that he will go forward with his amendment at this time.

AMENDMENT NO. 2888

(Purpose: To prohibit funds from being used to support terrorist operations in, over or offshore from the territory of Nicaragua)

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD) proposes an amendment numbered 2888.

On page 5, line 2 strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated under this heading may be made available, directly or indirectly, for planning, directing, executing, or supporting acts of terrorism in, over, or offshore from the territory of Nicaragua."

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I hope my colleagues were listening to the text of the amendment. I will repeat it for them. It says "that none of the funds appropriated under this heading can be made available, directly or indirectly, for planning, directing, executing, or supporting acts of terrorism in or over or offshore from the territory of Nicaragua." It does not cut out a nickel of funding. It does not reduce the overall amount.

We saw the results of the amendment just offered. I am not suggesting that we reduce the amount. I am merely suggesting that our policy in this part of the world be consistent with our proper and correct admonition against similar types of activities wherever they occur on the globe, and that is to abhor, to oppose, and to object in every way possible to state-supported terrorists of every kind.

Mr. President, I ask for order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to be heard in support of his amendment. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, this amendment is quite simple in scope and is absolutely consistent with the ideals on which our foreign policy has always been based: Rather than eliminate the requested $21 million for aid to the Contras in Nicaragua, it would require only that those funds not be used to support acts of terrorism in that country.

Without this amendment, I fear the United States will continue a policy in Nicaragua that, at the very least, implies that we will use a selective definition of "terrorism" to suit our objectives in different parts of the world, and, at the very worst, can be correctly construed as blatant hypocrisy.

Ever since President Reagan took office, he has undertaken efforts to combat international terrorism that have properly enjoyed wide support in this body and elsewhere. "Let terrorists be aware," the President warned just days after being sworn in, "That when the rules of international behavior are violated, our policy will be one of swift and effective retribution." Alexander Haig, at his first press conference as Secretary of State, proclaimed that international terrorism would replace human rights as the priority concern of U.S. foreign policy, and just yesterday, Secretary of State Shultz drew an even deeper line by implying that the United States might need to take preventive or pre-emptive action against terrorist groups: "It is increasingly doubtful," he said, "that a purely passive strategy can even begin to cope with the problem."

To back up its tough talk, the administration has deployed an elaborate network of new offices, interdepartmental groups, and task forces. At the State Department, every terrorist incident is painstakingly tallied, classified and recorded on a color-coded map to demonstrate just where the atrocities have occurred most frequently.

But when it comes to Nicaragua, the accuracy of those maps and charts is questionable because of an apparent double standard—and I emphasize "apparent double standard." The Contras—many of them former members of the universally despised Somoza national guard—are paid with American dollars, armed with American weapons, and trained by American advisers. And they are systematically conducting operations which, under any other circumstances, we would routinely define as terrorism and vigorously condemn.

I can cite a number of examples:

For instance, this administration, properly, was irate and quick to condemn last month's Libyan bombing of Sudan's main radio station, but remained silent last September after Contras attacked the Managua Airport with the objective—as Contra leaders told us—of destroying "The Voice of Nicaragua."

And in 1982, when the African National Congress, a terrorist group in the administration's lexicon, destroyed a vital oil depot in South Africa, the act was vehemently denounced. Yet that same administration had no such reaction to the Contras attack on oil storage facilities in Puerto Sandino.

In the Middle East, President Reagan has correctly made it clear that this country will not tolerate Iranian mines in the Straits of Hormuz. But did he speak out when Dutch and Russian ships were damaged by Contra mines outside of the Nicaraguan ports of Cortino and Puerto Sandino? The answer, unfortunately, again is that the administration has applied its selective definition of terrorism and kept silent.

Just this week, the administration properly condemned a Palestinian guerrilla faction claiming responsibility for the bombing of a civilian bus in Ashdod, Israel, which killed an elderly man and woman. The State Department will, undoubtedly, and correctly, call this a terrorist incident. Not so last August, however, when the Contra ambush of a civilian bus near Jinotega left 10 dead, including a woman holding her 6-month-old daughter.

The administration has yet to explain the distinctions between these cases. The reason is that it cannot. The harsh reality seems to be that we will vigorously, and properly so, oppose international terrorism wherever it occurs in the world—unless we are paying for it. We will excuse, even equip, terrorists when we perceive them to be on our side.

This position is hardly in keeping with our traditions as a nation. For 200 years we have insisted that the means do count as well as the ends. We have accepted as a national obligation the charge to adhere to the highest standards of political morality. Our actions have not always measured up to that exacting standard, but by maintaining it as an ideal, we have kept ourselves from straying too far from its worthy purposes.

By giving our moral and financial blank check to the Contras, we have threatened that proud tradition as well as our efforts to control international terrorism. We take a harsh view toward terrorism elsewhere in the world, but turn a blind eye when it suits our purposes in our own backyard.

This week and on countless occasions before, we have debated in this body the usefulness of supporting the Contras in Nicaragua. I continue to believe that, even if limited to military engagements against Sandinista forces, Contra activitities are counterproductive to our interests in this hemisphere.

But there seems to me a special moral contradiction in giving the Contras free reign to bomb nonmilitary targets, mine harbors used by vessels of other countries, and assault innocent civilians.

This amendment, without otherwise limiting administration conduct of Central American policy, would put a stop to that moral contradiction. It is a simple declaration that the United States opposes terrorism in any form, for any purpose, at any place. It will show that 90 percent of the American public who, according to opinion surveys, view terrorism as a serious world problem, the United States is committed to doing the right thing.

I emphasize that if killing civilians or demolishing energy facilities or threatening neutral shipping is terrorism in Iran or South Africa or Israel or anywhere else, and I believe it is, then it does not go by a different name in Nicaragua.

It is not a question of holding ourselves to a higher standard than we allow for the rest of the world. It is simply a matter of moral consistency.

How can we possibly ask less of ourselves than we demand of other nations?

Are we going to have an office for combating terrorism in the State Department and an office for implementing terrorism at the CIA?

What is our real objection to Qadhafi or Arafat or Idi Amin—only that they are not on our side?

Why have the wordsmiths in the Executive Office Building burned the midnight oil thinking of new ways to denounce terrorism while American advisers work overtime in Honduras teaching the Contras how to practice it?

This amendment does not eliminate the funds for covert operations in Honduras and Nicaragua. It does not reduce the amount by one nickel. But it does say that we should not let that money be used for murder or blowing up civilian targets or threatening the shipping of neutral or even friendly nations.

I hope this Nation will have the fundamental decency to promise at least that much.

Mr. President, this evening, we received a letter from the President of the United States restating what goals of this country are in Nicaragua, and I quote paragraph two of that letter

> The fact is, no change has occurred. The United States does not seek to destabilize or overthrow the Government of Nicaragua; nor to impose or compel any particular form of government there.

I may not agree with the expenditure of these funds in any case, but certainly the President's stated intent is that these funds not be used for terrorism. Clearly that is the intent of us in this body.

All I am suggesting is that we write what we all agree to into this particular piece of legislation.

I am confident I will be asked by my colleagues, How do you define terrorism? What is your definition of terrorism?

Mr. President, I would not be so presumptuous as to ask my colleagues to accept my definition of terrorism. I am going to take the State Department's definition and use that, if that is appropriate. In its September 1983 report "Patterns of International Terrorism," 1982, issued in September of this past year, our State Department provides a definition of terrorism. This is not mine but theirs, which I will accept, and I quote it, Mr. President:

> Terrorism: the threat or the use of violence for political purposes by individuals or groups, whether acting for or in opposition to established governmental authority, when such actions are intended to influence a target group wider than the immediate victim or victims.

"International terrorism," it goes on:

> Is terrorism conducted with the support of a foreign government or organization and/or directed against foreign nationals, institutions, or governments. International terrorism has involved groups seeking to overthrow specific regimes, to rectify national or group grievances, or to undermine international order as an end in itself.

Those words can be somewhat vague. However, I emphasize that it is not my definition, they are this administration's definitions of terrorism and international terrorism.

This report goes on to cite specific cases of what it means by that definition, and I think that may help my colleagues understand what they mean. I refer in this report, Mr. President, to page 8 of this report, table 3, in which the administration has a graph called Regional Distribution of International Terrorism. It cites the various examples of what it specifically thinks are terrorist acts or what it judges as terrorist acts, and I quote the following list:

Kidnapping, barricade/hostage, bombing, armed attack, hijacking, assassination, sniping, threats, or hoax.

I am not sure about a hoax, but it is under this administration's definition a terrorist attack.

And then there is "other," which it does not break down any further.

So I am willing to accept that even more specific delineation in addition to the definition provided by this administration of terrorism and international terrorism. Let me simply ask my colleagues this evening whether or not they support having this language included in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I am glad to yield to my colleague from Louisiana.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The language of the Senator's amendment is very appealing to me. The language of the State Department's definition of terrorism, particularly its example, for example, blowing up a PLO dump, which does not strike me as being necessarily terrorist. The kind of terrorism that I generally think of goes beyond what I think of as terror.

My question is, Would we be bound by the State Department's definition if we voted for this amendment, or would the word "terror" be able to be defined anew as someone else might define it?

Mr. DODD. I appreciate my colleague's question.

My concern was that my colleagues would say to me, "You have one definition and someone else has another definition," and I thought rather than getting involved in that, I would just use this administration's definition. I am not asking us to support the Dodd definition of terrorism or anyone else's, but merely this administration's and then cite what they have listed as specific acts.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Would the Senate be binding the expenditure of this money according to the State Department's definition and list of examples?

Mr. DODD. I would think that if the administration decided that some other act were a terrorist act in another country as it did, for instance, when it declared as a terrorist incident the bombing of the oil depot. When the African National Congress in South Africa bombed the oil depot there, this administration called it a terrorist act.

That is what they call a terrorist act there. They may want to decide that in Nicaragua the same thing is not, but I am trying to seek some consistency in all of this. That is the reason. So I did not want it to be open ended.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The answer would be yes if it is used.

Mr. DODD. If used, yes.

I might also suggest the question that occurred, what do you allow in this kind of thing? Again, I am opposed to the Contra actions altogether, but I suppose if you focused on a military target or you were interdicting arms, which we are told was the rationale in the first place for this, I would not by these definitions have any difficulty with that.

Again I emphasize I am opposed to Contra activity altogether. All I am just trying to suggest is that, in those acts which we have universally declared to be acts of terrorism, we apply that same consistent standard. State-subsidized terrorism, after all, is a principal concern to this administration. We should deplore it universally in this body as the President has tonight in his very eloquent letter to us where he defines the purpose of our activities in Nicaragua.

In fact, I hope we might even have universal endorsement of this amendment since it seems to be something we have all talked about. We devote a great deal of time to opposing it. We have agencies and task force and study groups. The Secretary of State last night had an eloquent speech before the Trilateral Commission in which he identified once again international terrorism as a great threat around the globe.

I think everyone agrees with that. We certainly support that.

Let us just say this evening that we want to take those eloquent words of our Secretary of State and of our President and of our former Secretary of State and we now want to put them to work in Central America. We only ask that we ourselves do not engage in state-supported terrorism.

I am not asking for anything more than that in this amendment, and I urge the adoption of the provision.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 5 minutes?

Mr. DODD. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, let us talk for a minute about what the Contras are really doing in Nicaragua. According to published reports:

On December 19, 1983, the Contras attacked a farm cooperative in El Coco. After a furious battle that lasted over 2 hours, the town was taken and 14 people were killed, including 2 young women.

On February 25, 1984, two fishing boats hit mines and were sunk off the Caribbean Port of El Bluff. Two members of the crew were killed; seven were wounded.

For 4 days straight, on March 1, 2, 3, and 4, three border towns were indiscriminately shelled by mortar fire from within Honduras.

On March 7, 1984, a Panamanian freighter struck mines in the Harbor of Corinto, suffering severe damage and injuring crew members.

On March 16, 1984, the Contras killed three peasants and a school director in the town of Esta-Lee.

That same day, 7 members of a farm cooperative were killed in the town of San Ramón.

The following day, on March 17, 11 peasants were shot down in an ambush and 7 more were kidnaped in Pueblo Nuevo.

Is this how the U.S. Senate wants that $21 million to be used down in Nicaragua—attacking farm cooperatives; ambushing peasants; sinking fishing boats; murdering schoolteachers; and killing schoolchildren?

I think not. I think not.

The people of the United States do not support terrorism and sabotage; and we should say so tonight.

If we are going to go ahead and send taxpayers' money to Nicaragua, if we are going to go ahead and support the President's secret war, let us at least be sure that U.S. dollars will be used for U.S. purposes.

We have been told that we are not supporting an effort to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua and a lot of Senators relied on that tonight.

We have been told that it is not Mr. Reagan's policy to support terror or sabotage in Nicaragua.

Well then, let us make it part of the law.

I have argued we should cut off all funds for this secret war against Nicaragua. But if funds are going to be provided, they should at least be strictly conditioned.

Let us tell the President that he cannot use this money to support people who are engaged in terror.

I commend the Senator from Connecticut for his decision to offer this amendment. I support it. And I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Massachusetts for his comments.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I yield to our distinguished ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Rhode Island. How much time does he desire?

Mr. PELL. Two minutes.

Mr. DODD. I am glad to yield 2 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I think this is an excellent amendment. It is to put into practice the old adage—put our money where our mouth is. We talk a lot about terrorism. We deplore it but apparently are practicing it. I hope we are not practicing it, and the proof we are not practicing it will be the passage of this amendment.

I hope the incidents that have been cited by the Senators from Connecticut and Massachusetts will not be repeated.

I am informed that the Minister of Defense of Nicaragua said that in the year of 1983 there were 400 terrorist attacks against civilians in Nicaragua, resulting in the death of 346 citizens, and over 500 peasants were taken from their homes.

These are specific instances that have been cited in Nicaragua. I hope very much that the amendment will pass.

Mr. TSONGAS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I am glad to yield to my colleague from Massachusetts whatever time he may need.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. President, I would like to commend the Senator from Connecticut. But, if I may, I would like to take a somewhat different tack because there will be people who will argue against this amendment and I would like to make an offer. The offer is this—if the Senator from Connecticut will agree—that we would provide for a Senator to get up and state that the Contras have not engaged in terrorism. It is very simple. We give them the money. They do what they do.

Now, some of you are on the Intelligence Committee. You know what is going on. It is an open invitation. You come up to the floor and state that the Contras that we support have not engaged in terrorism. That is the offer.

If you are going to vote against the amendment, at a minimum you should be secure in your own mind that there has not been terrorism. So I would invite those who would oppose the amendment to come up here, get on the Senate floor—we are all educated Senators; we know what we vote upon—and state categorically that there has been no terrorism against civilians conducted by the Contras

And I would hope that before we have a vote I could have time again, in case no one has come up to do that, to make that point. Or if someone has come up to do that, then I issue a second invitation. I will take you to Estalee where I was in August and I will show you the mothers, I will show you the fathers, I will show you the children without mothers, and you tell them the same thing. If you have the guts to come up here and make that kind of a statement, have the guts to go to Estalee with me. I will take you myself.

It is very easy to vote on these things, but you are killing people. We debate school prayer. We care. And then we kill. That is what the amendment is about—killing—mothers, children, sons. That is your vote.

So I would hope before the vote occurs, the Senator will yield to me. And the invitation is to all of you. Let one person come on this floor and state there has been no terrorism. If not one person can say that, then how can the amendment do anything but succeed? That is the test before the Senate. And I am giving you a chance to recognize that if this is not going to pass, you have committed fellow human beings to death. That is the vote. That is what it is all about. So the invitation is open. And I am very much looking forward to someone coming up here and making that statement. I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DODD. I thank my colleague from Massachusetts. And I welcome his challenge, and would second it, for someone to come up and suggest to this body that in fact terrorist acts are not being committed. I think that certainly would help.

Let me suggest something else. I am sure someone will say, "You know, that guy DODD has a definition from the State Department, but I don't like his definition of terrorism."

I am willing to entertain other definitions. I am just trying to use one that I thought would be the least objectionable, and that was one written by the administration.

And, of course, the definition of international terrorism is hard to rewrite because it is one that has existed since 1948. It was universally accepted by all the signatories of the universal declaration of human rights going back to 1948.

But as to the definition, if anybody has a better one, as I say, I want to hear it; I just tried to use the State Department's definition and what the President sent us from that wonderful letter telling us what he was doing. I was just using his definition, in effect.

I am glad to yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BIDEN. Will the Senator be willing to read the definition again?

Mr. DODD. Certainly. There are two definitions. For the benefit of my colleagues, I am reading from a September 1983 report from the U.S. Department of State entitled "Patterns of International Terrorism, 1982." The definitions are on the first page:

> Terrorism: The threat or use of violence for political purposes by individuals or groups, whether acting for, or in opposition to, established governmental authority, when such actions are intended to influence a target group wider than the immediate victim or victims.

International terrorism is defined in the following way:

> Terrorism conducted with the support of a foreign government organization and/or directed against foreign nationals, institutions, or governments. International terrorism has involved groups seeking to overthrow specific regimes, to rectify national or group grievances, or to undermine international order as an end in itself.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DODD. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Is the Senator saying that we would not then be bound by that definition since that is actually not one but two definitions and since there is a great deal of debate, we would not be bound by it but that you happen to think that is a good definition?

Mr. DODD. Yes. My colleague will understand, I did not include the definition in my amendment because I wanted to leave that up to the administration. I presume they are going to use the same definition they used in their report, but that is, I suppose, up to them. If they want to come up with some different one, I would like to know about it.

But I am not asking my colleagues to vote tonight on a definition. I am merely suggesting that I accept the administration's definition. As my friend from Louisiana knows, I went a bit further than that because, granted, the words are vague in the sense they are general words, although I think we all understand them fairly well and I went to page 8 of their report where they provide specific examples.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator would yield at that point, the first definition talks about a victim and one of the examples talks about property of the POL dump. To me, terrorism does involve victims; that is, attacks on persons, as opposed to property. And I would not personally want to include all attacks on property that does not involve victims.

Mr. DODD. I personally do not have any problem with that. All I tried to do is point out that the administration identified the attack by the African National Congress which went into South Africa as an outside group and blew up a French oil depot. Now, the administration calls it a terrorist attack. My colleague from Louisiana may have a different feeling about that particular situation. But I am only using what the administration cited as a terrorist act because there was a similar circumstance in Nicaragua.

Mr. TSONGAS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. TSONGAS. I think the argument the Senator from Louisiana makes about there being a victim does have the potential to gain support. And I would not presume to speak for the Senator from Connecticut, but I think, as far as I an concerned, that definition, although incomplete, would be something I could live with.

Mr. BIDEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. BIDEN. I think I am going to support the Senator's amendment. But I am not sure how the definition read is different than war. Is war terrorism?

The second question I have, and I would like an answer because I think on some occasion that there is a requirement for government to be able to retain for itself the right to support or engage in covert activity. And I suspect we all do at some point. Now, is there any covert activity that is not a terrorist activity anywhere in the world?

Mr. DODD. Interdiction of arms—which is the stated goal here at the outset anyway and reason for this particular activity—I do not consider an act of terror. If you have a military target, an army post or military post, or you engage a military group in combat, I do not think that falls within the definition of terrorism. I think there are a variety of activities—which again I want to emphasize to my friend from Delaware I am not approving of but—which my amendment does not target, if you will, those particular kinds of activities.

I am more comfortable, in effect, with my colleague from Louisiana's further delineation that we are talking about incidents involving innocent victims. I merely cited the oil depot example because that was one that the administration had used itself and had been a similar fact situation in Nicaragua with an outside group going into a country and blowing up an oil depot.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, the reason I ask the question is I think it is important that we make it pretty clear we do not like what is being done—that is implicit in this amendment—by the Contras in Nicaragua. But, on the other hand, I do not want to be part of setting a precedent that would, in fact, have made the American Revolution a terrorist activity. We did not only move against armies in the American Revolution. We did everything from disrupting ships and dumping tea into harbors to blowing up commercial facilities. Minutemen were running around doing silly things like that. I do not think we would want to say they were terrorists.

I want to make sure that we are not getting ourselves into situations in the future where there are in fact indigent revolutions that in fact do target economic targets, and do in fact target people who are not in uniform and say it is automatically a terrorist activity.

I do not think that is what my colleagues mean. I want to make that clear. If you read that ridiculous definition of the State Department which is not yours—it is theirs—it seems awfully all encompassing. It sounds like they are saying war is a terrorist activity.

Mr. DODD. Let me say, first of all, that in our own revolution, while certainly we were at war, we were all conscious of the fact that innocent civilians could be involved. I emphasize again to my colleague from Delaware that the declared purpose of our administration here is not to overthrow the government or destabilize it in any way.

This is a letter dated April 4, 1984, signed by the President of the United States only a few hours ago. He is telling us today that is not the declared purpose. I agree with him. I ask my colleagues to agree with him tonight, in effect. If destabilization is not a declared purpose, we should not have any difficulty in joining with the President in effect stating unequivocally that we do not believe in supporting terrorism with our tax dollars.

Mr. BIDEN. The point that I want to make clear, if the Senator will yield, is that I am going to support the Senator's amendment. But to support this amendment does not mean that one would automatically have to be consistent in the future in being opposed to any covert activity anywhere in the world. That is the only point I want to make. I know the Senator from Massachusetts is very concerned.

Without going into a lot of detail about the situation in Afghanistan, the situation in Afghanistan is that the rebels, the people of Afghanistan are trying to throw off the yoke of the Soviet Union that has been thrust upon them. They are engaged in activities which by the State Department definition is terrorism. They are targeting folks. They "ain't" just targeting military places. They are going after the infrastructure. They are hitting everything from ammunition depots to anybody who walks and looks like a Russian.

Mr. DODD. If I could interrupt my friend for 1 minute, let me recite a couple of examples.

The PLO blows up a civilian Israeli bus and kills 10 people. Is that a terrorist activity?

Mr. BIDEN I would say so.

Mr. DODD. That is No. 1. And we had a similar situation in Nicaragua. Second we have Qadhafi go in, bomb the Sudanese radio station, and people suffer as a result of that. Is that a terrorist activity or not?

Mr. BIDEN. Not necessarily.

By the way, if the civilian radio station is under the control of the Soviet Union, and, in fact, the Afghan rebels are trying to gain control of their country, they have declared it. The Afghans declared it. We have not declared. I am not commenting on whether or not we are helping the Afghans.

We have not declared for a lot of reasons whether or not we should help the Afghans. But, in fact, the Afghan rebels—and they are one tough bunch of dudes—go in and blow up a radio station manned by civilian Afghan folks under the control of the Soviet military in order to gain control of the communications system and to allow them to then move on to the military barracks. I do not call that terrorism.

Mr. DODD. It is terrorism only when we oppose them. If we support them, it is OK.

Mr. BIDEN. No. I think that is war. The fact of the matter is, it is important to respond to that. It seems to me that there were occasions in World War II and in the Korean war where we can point out there were civilian-controlled facilities like radio stations in the control of the enemy, under the aegis of the enemy. We went in and took it out in order to be able to meet a military objective.

Mr. DODD. My friend, is not that a declared war?

Mr. BIDEN. You know that is a declared war.

Mr. DODD. Are we not merely stating here what the President said to us himself this evening?

Mr. TSONGAS. Will the Senators yield?

Mr. BIDEN. I am not against you. I just want to make sure I know.

Mr. TSONGAS. The amendment is specific to Nicaragua. It has no reference to Afghanistan or any place else. I am the author of the resolution on Afghanistan. I share the Senator's view. This is Nicaragua-specific. It has no application beyond that.

Mr. BIDEN. What we are really trying to do, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, is make sure that we point out that the President of the United States has a policy that is contrary to what our national interest is. If that is what this is all about, and, in fact, if we all say terrorism is worth doing, it is fine, it is terrorist activity, then I want to make sure when I go through this amendment while I am on the record that later today or later next year, if we were to for example support covert activities in Afghanistan—assume we did, assume the Afghans blew up a civilian radio station, and assume civilians died—that no one on the floor will say "Hey, BIDEN, remember you voted against that kind of activity in Nicaragua. You should stand up now and vote against it in Afghanistan." I just want to point that out.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time. I presume the opponents of the amendment may have some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, are any of my colleagues here who wish to speak in behalf of the amendment? I state to my friend from Connecticut that at some appropriate time—I define appropriate as being very soon—I will probably move to table this amendment. That is why I ask if there is anyone here who would like to speak.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, why not an up or down vote on it? We have had up or down votes all afternoon on other amendments.

Mr. RUDMAN. It is my understanding that it is the intention of the floor manager to table, and I am sitting in for him at this moment. I will certainly check to be sure.

Mr. DODD. Why is this amendment any different? What is the difference between this amendment and the others that we have had up or down votes on?

Mr. RUDMAN. I believe there is some precedent for tabling other amendments here, in the absence of specific amendments with the offeror of the amendment.

Mr. DODD. What did we do on the last amendment? Was that an up or down vote, or a motion to table?

Mr. RUDMAN. I just wondered if anyone else wished to speak. I have a few words to say but I would not want to make that motion until everyone here who wishes to speak has had the opportunity.

Mr. SARBANES. What is the answer to the question?

Mr. RUDMAN. I did not realize there was a requirement to answer the question.

Mr. SARBANES. There is no requirement.

Mr. RUDMAN. I choose not to answer the question. I have simply stated to my friend from Maryland that there have been a whole string of amendments here today, yesterday, and some have been tabled. Some have been voted up-and-down. It is my instruction from the manager of this bill that it was his desire to table. If he wishes to change that, he will change it. If not, he will move to table.

Mr. SARBANES. All I am asking is to know from the acting manager of the bill, since the proposer of the amendment is seeking an up-and-down vote, why he will not give him an up-and-down vote on his amendment.

Mr. RUDMAN. Whose time is this discussion taking place on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I would like to yield the floor back and let the discussion take place on the time of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator does not intend to answer the question?

Mr. RUDMAN. I believe I have answered the question.

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator has not anwered the question as to why he will not give Senator DODD an up-or-down vote on his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. LEVIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, to whose time is the quorum call being charged?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not specify.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, how much time remains to this side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty minutes.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I have said everything I want to say on this. Maybe a colleague or two wants to say something more. If someone opposes this amendment, I wish they would come over and tell us why. I am anxious to vote on this, but I want to give the opponents of this amendment an opportunity to speak. I will gladly yield to my colleague from Massachusetts whatever time he desires.

Mr. TSONGAS. If I may inquire of my neighbor from the same part of the country, we both come from the same part of the country and live close to each other, could the Senator do a favor for me and indicate that the Contras have not engaged in terrorism? The Senator, I take it, is opposed to the amendment. As such, can the Senator state for the record that the Contras we support have not engaged in terrorism?

Mr. RUDMAN. I would simply say to my colleague that evidently we are getting further and further into a situation where we are running, I suppose, what we would call overt-covert activities. I have no personal knowledge, not being privileged to be a member of the Intelligence Committee, to give an authoritative answer, so I cannot answer the question.

Mr. TSONGAS. Is there anybody who could? Is there anybody who could even whisper in my ear? I will accept a written note.

Mr. RUDMAN. I will say to my friend from Massachusetts that we had a few moments ago voted essentially to fund a program that is described as military or paramilitary activities. It seems to me there was a very excellent discussion among the Senator from Delaware, the Senator from Massachusetts, and the Senator from Connecticut which indicates the great difficulty in trying to define what that word means. I would agree with the Senator from Delaware that one man's terror is probably somebody else's war. I really do not know what this means.

Mr. TSONGAS. I will give an example.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, whose time are we on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. TSONGAS. A doctor and nurse drive out to where there has been Contra activity, to give an example. They are in a jeep, and the jeep is marked with a red cross. The jeep is fired upon, and the doctor and the nurse are killed. Would the Senator consider that terrorism?

Mr. RUDMAN. I want to say to my friend from Massachusetts, after long years of practicing law I find it not proper to answer double questions.

Mr. TSONGAS. It happened.

Mr. RUDMAN. You are stating that from personal knowledge. I do not have personal knowledge.

Mr. TSONGAS. Take my word. We met the husband of that woman and the children of that woman. This is not a hypothetical question. The woman is dead. She is dead because we voted the money. Does the Senator want more of that? That is what the Senator is voting for. That is what the Senator is voting for, more people, civilians, being killed. We are trying to stop it.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I would like to reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote. Vote.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator from Connecticut answer one question? I will not belabor the point at this hour. Does the Senator have a definition of the word "terrorism" incorporated in his amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair inquire on whose time the Senator is proceeding?

Mr. NUNN. Will someone yield to me?

Mr. DODD. I will be glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. NUNN. Is there a definition which defines terrorism and distinguishes terrorism from other activities which would not be terrorism?

Mr. DODD. I do not include a definition in the amendment because obviously reasonable people could have some difficulty over that. What I have read into the RECORD is the State Department definition incorporated in a report of theirs issued a few months back where they define the terms "terrorism" and "international terrorism," and then cite some specific examples of what they mean by them. I am willing to accept their definitions. If someone else would prefer another one, that is fine. But I would prefer not to tie the amendment down by including some specific definition in there. Rather, I am willing to accept what this administration decides is terrorism. Whatever definition they are willing to apply to it, I am willing to accept. I think since we have made such a case of talking about terrorism, including the Secretary of State last evening before the Trilateral Commission, one of the first press conferences by former Secretary of State Haig defining terrorism as his great interest in human rights, the President's talking about terrorism a few days after his inaugural address, I think they have placed a great deal of emphasis on this international problem. I agree with them. I am willing to accept their definition and use the word terrorism, and let them apply that definition as it affects this particular country with these particular funds.

Mr. NUNN. I share the sentiments of the Senator from Connecticut on this point. I think there is a very thin line here. I think it is very important that our Nation, in our quest for trying to get other countries around the world to join us in our fight against terrorism, we ourselves, is able to draw that line consistently. The question I have at this late hour is whether we have indeed drawn that line, and whether we know what the word means in this amendment.

Let me ask a hypothetical question. Hypothetically, if any of this money were to be used by, say, guerrilla forces to intercept arms from Nicaragua leading to El Salvador, by, let us say, blowing up a warehouse, and let us say the warehouse was guarded by armed personnel of the Nicaraguan Government and there was good information that warehouse was being used to supply other Central American countries, would that be terrorism under this?

Mr. DODD. Not as far as this Senator is concerned. That is a military target, the interdiction of arms.

Mr. NUNN. The Senator is getting to innocent civilians?

Mr. DODD. Protecting innocent civilians is the thrust of it.

Mr. NUNN. Hypothetical action against armed forces would not constitute terrorism?

Mr. DODD. Not to this Senator.

Mr. NUNN. And the Senator would not define terrorism as being, let us say, an activity against, let us say, boats going from one country to another supplying arms?

Mr. DODD. Not where the boats are armed. If you had military equipment on there, and you were focusing your target on military personnel, unfortunately they may be victimized but I would not say that it was terrorism.

Mr. NUNN. And in the incidentals of that military target if civilians were killed but not by intention, would that be terrorism?

Mr. DODD. If the major purpose of that attack was a military target, I have no problem with that.

Mr. NUNN. But if there was an attack against the innocent civilians who had nothing to do with the smuggling of guns, were not part of the armed forces, but the attack was made against the innocent civilians in the form of intimidation, to intimidate the remainder of the population, would that be terrorism?

Mr. DODD. I believe it would be.

Mr. NUNN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. PELL. Would a fishing boat be an example of a military target?

Mr. DODD. If it were not a fishing boat, absolutely.

Mr. President, unless I have further requests for time—I have heard no one speak against the amendment. I can only assume that this will enjoy universal support.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator from Connecticut wish now to yield back his time? If he does, we are willing to yield back ours.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time. If we can just have an up or down vote, is that possible?

Mr. STEVENS. No, Mr. President; not until the time has expired.

Mr. DODD. Would my distinguished colleague from Alaska agree with me that we might have just an up or down vote as we have on other amendments?

Mr. STEVENS. No.

Mr. DODD. May I ask my distinguished colleague from Alaska why this amendment should be treated differently from the preceding ones?

Mr. STEVENS. Because this amendment is amendable if it is not tabled.

Mr. DODD. We are voting on it up or down.

Mr. STEVENS. If it is not tabled, it is subject to clarification. I believe it should be tabled. It is an ambiguous amendment.

Mr. DODD. Is there any objection to agreeing to this on a voice vote?

Mr. RUDMAN. Mr. President, I take it that the Senator from Connecticut wishes to reserve his time and I shall speak very briefly.

My friend and neighbor from Massachusetts described a very horrible situation and asked whether that was terrorism. Of course it is. The problem is that we are, by a vote of this body, funding an operation which is a covert operation, which we really cannot talk about in any great detail on this floor, as my friend from Massachusetts knows. The fact of the matter is that, in any military confrontation of this type or any other, there are acts which probably well could be described as terrorist acts and have been since the beginning of war. Certainly, anyone familiar with the history of the Vietnam war would have to say that things happened during that war that were hardly 100 percent military in nature and might well be described as terrorist on both sides.

The President has set forth in his letter what the intention of these funds is, what our policy is. The fact of the matter is that the last hour has proved one thing more than any other. No one doubts the good intentions of the Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Massachusetts. But the colloquy among the Senators from Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Delaware indicates very clearly the great difficulty that everyone would have in deciding what, in fact, the definition ought to be in a particular situation.

I expect we could probably sit here for weeks and list a whole group of things that, under certain circumstances, we could all agree would be terrorist. But in financing what we are financing under this appropriation, certainly, it is no one's intention, even those who oppose the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut—and I shall oppose it—to finance activities of the nature and the type described by the Senator from Massachusetts. But the very fact of the matter is that with the kind of activity that is being engaged in in Central America on both sides, there will be instances, there have been instances, in which, I suppose, terrorism could well be defined. But there is no way to place a restriction with the kind of definition that is contained in this particular amendment on this appropriation and essentially allow any funding whatsoever. The fact is that it cannot be satisfactorily defined.

So, for those who wish to vote against this amendment, I expect that they will vote against it not because they encourage or support the kind of activities aptly described by my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Connecticut, but because they are uncertain and unsure of what this really means. I certainly am.

Mr. TSONGAS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUDMAN. I am happy to yield.

Mr. TSONGAS. The truth is they know terrorism is going on. They know we are paying for it. They would rather not know. My job is to make it clear that it is happening, then let them vote for it and then go home and explain it.

Mr. RUDMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts makes it very clear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If neither side yields time, then time is charged equally against each side.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to my colleague from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, what is the time situation on this amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has 8 minutes. The Senator from New Hampshire has 56 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES. Was the original allocation of time 1 hour to a side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. SARBANES. So the Senator from Connecticut and others have used 52 minutes in support of the amendment and 4 minutes have been used against.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six and four.

Mr. SARBANES. Four minutes have been used against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut has used 52 minutes. The Senator from New Hampshire has used 4 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I think an amendment of this consequence deserves more than a pro forma statement such as we have just received from the Senator from New Hampshire with respect to his opposition to it.

I think the Senator from Georgia put it very well in, I thought, an excellent series of questions of the Senator from Connecticut in terms of the practices we are talking about. I hope there is nobody in this Chamber who wants to legitimize the kinds of terrorist acts which are detailed——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 1 minute has expired.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield me an additional minute?

Mr. DODD. I am happy to do so.

Mr. SARBANES. The kind of terrorist acts that were discussed there. In fact, it is the virtue of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut that he—at least I take it as a virtue is perceived by the opponents of the amendment that he would allow to the administration the opportunity to provide the most narrow definition of terrorism if they choose to do so. That is done by the fact that he has not sought to specify. Yet, even given that and even given some of the examples that have been cited of the kind of terrorist acts that are talked about, directed against innocent civilians, they proceed to the opposition to the amendment, but opposition of a sort that can barely bring itself to speak against it.

Then, to the extent of 4 pro forma minutes at the end of an hour's time and at the end of a time when we are being told that the Senate is not going to get an up or down vote, without any good reason being provided for that fact, I cannot understand the opposition to seeking to preclude terrorism of the nature that has been discussed here on the floor of the Senate. I particularly cannot understand the reluctance or the inability of those opposed to this amendment to state a case in opposition to it.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, may I ask for order, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, what time remains to the Senator from Connecticut?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 5 minutes.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I do not think I shall take all 5 minutes. Let me just conclude this way. The other side apparently does not wish to engage in much debate on it.

Let us just imagine tomorrow how this is going to look if the vote comes out against this amendment. We are going to be saying, in effect, that it is perfectly all right for the United States to subsidize a group of counterrevolutionaries, and if they blow up buses with innocent civilians aboard, that is all right with us.

We can mine harbors where international shipping and innocent civilians are involved, and that is no problem. It is perfectly all right to have as targets various things and people which have no military purpose whatsoever—Mr. President, may I ask for order in the Chamber?

It is perfectly all right to attack those targets. That is what we are saying here. The colloquy I had with my colleague from Georgia, I think, defined as appropriately as I could that assaulting military targets is not a terrorist attack. Innocent civilians who die as a result of an attack on a military target—that is not a terrorist attack—not by this Senator's definition. I am just trying to focus this thing a bit so we have some consistency to our definitions. We call terrorism one thing in one part of the world; we properly do so.

We cannot then turn around and subsidize it in another part of the world and write it off as being a necessary evil. That is all I am trying to do with this amendment, and I would like an up or down vote on it. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. RUDMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized.

Mr. RUDMAN. Does the Senator from Connecticut now yield back his time?

Mr. DODD. I have yielded it back.

Mr. RUDMAN. I will soon yield back our time and move to table, Mr. President.

I think I have stated the position in opposition as concisely as I can. I say to my friend from Maryland that if I could say anything I thought would add to my conception of the problem with the definition, I would try it. But it seems to me that we ought to strive for quality of debate, not necessarily the quantity of debate. I think I have said all I can say in about 5 minutes. Thus, I yield back the remainder of my time. I move to table the amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to table the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. WEICKER) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent on official business.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) and the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JEPSEN). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 43, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 53 Leg.]

So the motion to table the amendment (No. 2888) was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, we have gone as far as we can tonight. There will be no more rollcall votes tonight.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, until no later than 10:30 p.m., in which Senators may speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUPPORT FOR THE WATERSHED PROTECTION AND FLOOD PREVENTION PROGRAM

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, it is indeed refreshing to hear about a Federal program that works. The Public Law 566 watershed protection and flood prevention program, administered by the Department of Agriculture's Soil Conservation Service, is, in the view of one local sponsor, such a program.

On March 30, Nicholas J. Melas, president of the Metropolitan Sanitary District of Greater Chicago and Commissioner Connie Peters, accompanied by Representative GEORGE M. O'BRIEN, appeared before the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture, Rural Development and Related Agencies to attest to the value of the Public Law 566 program in Cook County, Ill. and to urge that Congress appropriate $150 million for the program in fiscal year 1985. Mr. Melas expressed disappointment that the administration requested funding only for those projects now under construction, with no new construction starts. I want to join with Representative O'BRIEN and Mr. Melas in urging full funding in fiscal year 1985 for the Public Law 566 program.

I ask unanimous consent to include at this point in the RECORD the introductory remarks of Representative O'BRIEN and the statement of Mr. Melas.

There being no objection, the statements are ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF GEORGE M. O'BRIEN

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you this morning to express my strong support for full funding of the Department of Agriculture's Public Law 566 watershed program.

The Little Calumet River Watershed flood control program in my Congressional district was one of the 20 new constructions ordered by this committee for fiscal 1984. Ground was broken last fall for the first project in the Little Calumet program.

The contracting agency for the Little Calumet projects is the Metropolitan Sanitary District of Greater Chicago. With me this morning are Mr. Nicholas J. Melas, president of the Sanitary District, and Mrs. Connie Peters, a member of the Sanitary District's Board of Commissioners, and chairman of its Flood Control, Drainage and Storm Flow Committee.

Flooding is a major problem in the Fourth Congressional district which I represent, encompassing a large part of Chicago's south suburban area, and Mrs. Peters and her committee have important responsibilities in developing policies and programs to handle these flooding problems.

Mr. Melas was first elected as a commissioner of the Metropolitan Sanitary District in 1962 and has been its president since 1975. A graduate in chemistry from the University of Chicago, he also earned a Master of Business Administration from that distinguished institution. He saw action in southern France and Germany with the 7th Army during World War II, and has been active in the Greek-American community of Chicago for many years. It is a privilege for me to be able to present such a distinguished citizen to this committee. Mr. Melas.

STATEMENT BY NICHOLAS J. MELAS, PRESIDENT, THE METROPOLITAN SANITARY DISTRICT OF GREATER CHICAGO

Mr. Chairman and members of the subcommittee, my name is Nicholas Melas, and I am president of the Metropolitan Sanitary District of Greater Chicago. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before this subcommittee today in support of adquate appropriations for the Public Law 566 small watershed flood control program. I am accompanied today by Commissioner Connie Peters, who chairs the district's flood control committee.

Flooding and related problems have been part of the history of the Chicago area since its earliest days. Our geographical location and flat terrain cause widespread flooding problems over large areas.

The Metropolitan Sanitary District (MSD) was established in 1889 and has the responsibility for sewage treatment, flood control and storm water management in Cook County, Illinois. MSD has assumed a flood control leadership role in the metropolitan area. In partnership with the Federal Government, particularly through the soil conservation service's Public Law 566 small watershed program and the flood control program of the Corps of Engineers, we are addressing the issue of flood control on a regional basis. Within its jurisdiction, MSD usually acts as the principal sponsor of SCS watershed projects and is generally responsible for the acquisition of land rights. To underscore our local commitment to this program, we have expended $23 million to date of local taxpayers' money.

I want to stress, Mr. Chairman, that although I am referring to SCS involvement in the Chicago Metropolitan Area, the area in question is rural, bordering on urban areas. In fact, much of the land is farmland.

In 1971, the sanitary district entered into a cooperative agreement with SCS to prepare river basin plans and to investigate flooding problems along the following rivers in the metropolitan area: Des Plaines, North Branch of Chicago River, Little Calumet, Poplar Creek, Calumet-Sag and Salt Creek watersheds. The primary goal of this study was to develop comprehensive plans to reduce existing floodwater damages. The problems and needs in each watershed were considered. As a result, projects were developed and are now being implemented through the cooperative efforts of Federal, state and local agencies.

One such plan, which was implemented in fiscal year 1984, is the Little Calumet River watershed plan in Cook and Will Counties. When completed, this project will provide benefits to the following communities: Tinley Park, Midlothian, Markham, Harvey, Dolton, Calumet City, Lynwood and Lansing. Flooding now causes damages to an estimated 7,000 homes and 150 businesses, as well as causing erosion to about 30,000 acres of agricultural land in the watershed as well as disruption of traffic. The watershed consists of 136,500 acres of land in a rapidly developing rural/urban area. The plan was developed to provide watershed protection and environmental enhancement through an accelerated land treatment program to reduce flood damages by implementing structural and non-structural flood control measures, and to provide increased water-based recreation. Included are excavated reservoirs, flood proofing of structures, channel maintenance and soil conservation practices. When completed, over $4 million in estimated annual flood damages, principally overbank flooding, will be prevented.

Also being implemented is the watershed plan for Upper Salt Creek to protect such communities as: Elk Grove Village, Rolling Meadows, Schaumburg, Palatine and Arlington Heights. Within this watershed some 1,950 acres, containing 1,200 residences, 5 businesses and 24 major transportation routes, are subject to flooding. Like the Little Calumet project, the Upper Salt Creek project consists of excavated reservoirs, flood proofing of structures, channel modification and land treatment measures. When completed, over $1 million in estimated annual flood damages will be prevented.

Mr. Chairman, I cite MSD's experience with the Public Law 566 program as a means of saying, here is a Federal program that works. Projects undertaken with its funding can, and do, save lives and property from the devastating effects of flooding.

In reviewing the administration's fiscal year 1985 budget, I was disappointed, as I am sure you were, to note that no new construction funding was requested for Public Law 566. Instead, the administration wants only funding to complete what is now under construction. If this were allowed to happen, it would have a devastating effect on our flood control efforts in Cook County and undoubtedly in other areas of the nation.

Congress has provided an adequate level of Public Law 566 funding in the past. I am here to ask you to do so again—to provide at least $150 million in new construction funding in fiscal year 1985, the same amount as provided in fiscal year 1984.

Mr. Chairman, that completes my statement. I would be pleased to answer any questions.

MORTGAGE REVENUE BONDS SPUR HOUSING INDUSTRY GROWTH

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, unquestionably, one of the best ways to improve our economy is to promote home ownership. The mortgage revenue bond programs administered by the Illinois Housing Development Authority (IHDA) will have enabled almost 5,000 moderate income households to attain the dream of homeownership by mid-1984. In the 3 years between the passage of State enabling legislation and the December 1983 Federal sunset date, the authority launched three programs which provided an invaluable consumer service to first-time home buyers and stimulated a depressed homebuilding sector. The authority was created by the Illinois General Assembly in 1967 to expand housing opportunities for households shut out of the private housing market, including low- and moderate-income families, seniors, and the handicapped.

Many young households who otherwise could not have afforded home ownership benefited from the 2 to 3 percentage point spread between private market mortgage rates and interest rates on loans backed by mortgage revenue bonds. On average, this spread reduced housing costs by about $100 per month—enough to make homeownership a reality for households with a total average income of $27,947. At a time when soaring housing costs make downpayment requirements impossible for many low- and moderate-income first-time home buyers, the authority's affordable mortgage programs required only a 5-percent downpayment. About 90 percent of the authority's borrowers used the below-market interest rate and low downpayment requirement to purchase two or three bedroom homes. The average price for homes purchased through IHDA's mortgage programs was $52,468.

Mortgage revenue bonds also provide a vital stimulus to the interest-rate sensitive homebuilding industry. By targeting bond proceeds to home builders, mortgage programs like the authority's generate important countercyclical effects. Depending on the health of the private economy, the authority has reserved 40 to 67 percent of its bond proceeds for new home construction. This homebuilder set-aside has produced the equivalent of between 2,000 and 3,000 full-time jobs in the construction industy alone. These jobs, in turn, have generated over $8 million in Federal income tax revenues. The programs also have generate more than $5 million in State and local tax revenues. Thus, consumers, the homebuilding industry, and Government at all levels receive benefits from mortgage revenue bonds.

Unfortunately, authority to issue mortgage revenue bonds expired on December 31, 1983. For this reason, I am cosponsoring the Housing Finance Opportunity Act, S. 137, which will allow continuation of tax-exempt mortgage revenue bonds. Unless this legislation I am consponsoring is passed, thousands of families will have homeownership put out of their reach. With signs of economic recovery all around us, taking away this incentive would be a grave mistake.

ARGENTINA'S FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC DIFFICULTIES

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am very concerned over the deal that was recently worked out to help Argentina meet interest payments on its debts. In my view, U.S. participation in this deal should be carefully examined.

I am well aware of the serious nature of Argentina's financial and economic difficulties. Indeed, it is a problem common to many nations. Argentina owes an enormous debt to both foreign banks and governments. In fact, most of those banks are U.S. banks.

Under the terms of the agreement worked out last week, the U.S. Treasury will lend Argentina $300 million from its Exchange Stabilization Fund. That money will enable Argentina to pay back four Latin American countries who put up money last week to pay the banks. I am very much opposed to the use of U.S. taxpayers' dollars to bail out our Nation's largest banks.

Despite the assertions of Treasury Department officials, the main winners in this deal will be banks like Manufacturers Hanover, Bank America, and other large banks. These banks made business deals on which they expected to make a profit. Yet, unlike most businesses, the big banks have no intention of taking a loss resulting from a bad management decision. Even though the loan is scheduled to be of short duration, the precariousness of Argentina's situation makes nothing certain.

We are told that this U.S. loan will not be made unless an agreement is reached between the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and Argentina. Yet, I am skeptical. If an agreement with the IMF is not made, will our Government really stand by and watch Mexico, Venezuela, Brazil, and Colombia take losses on their loans to Argentina? I think not. Instead, I believe the American taxpayers will once again be asked to send their hard-earned dollars overseas.

Our Government faces its own severe financial problems. We are facing a $200 billion deficit this year. We cannot go on committing U.S. dollars all over the world while our own people are forced to deal with cuts in Government programs and high interest rates. I think the time has come to ask where we draw the line. At what point do we say that America is not the holder of a bottomless pot of funds? I think the time is now. I am submitting for the information of the Senate today the text of an amendment that I intend to propose which would restrict the ability of the Treasury Department to participate in this kind of bank bailout. If I do not receive clear assurances that no U.S. taxpayer money will be jeopardized in the Argentina deal, I will offer this amendment to an available legislative vehicle.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the proposed amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the proposed amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. —

To amend subsection (b), to add, following the first sentence of that subsection:

The Secretary may not, however, use the fund in any way that would, either directly or indirectly, substitute U.S. government commitments to foreign entities for the obligations of U.S. commercial banks.

ORDER PLACING H.R. 4707 ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have one unanimous-consent request that appears to have been cleared by the minority leader. I will state it now for his consideration and that of other Members.

I ask unanimous consent that once the Senate receives from the House, H.R. 4707, the Arizona Wilderness Act of 1984, it be placed on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have nothing further. I inquire of the minority leader if he has anything further.

Mr. BYRD. I have nothing further.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, are we now in morning business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

VICE ADMIRAL WEYMOUTH AND BRUCE BISHOP SPEAK IN SUPPORT OF PEACE ACADEMY TO TEXAS AUDIENCE

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, in the face of the war-torn situation we face throughout the world, let us bring together the best minds from various professions and countries around the world, put them in one place, and teach them, train them in the techniques of conflict resolution.

This is not an impossible dream. It is a plan. It is an idea whose time has come at long last, but not too soon. It is the goal of the proposed U.S. Academy of Peace.

Last month, two distinguished advocates of the proposed Peace Academy addressed members of the Gulf Coast Council on Foreign Affairs and their guests in Houston, Tex., urging them to support the proposal.

Vice Adm. Ralph Weymouth, USN, retired, told members of the audience that "the Academy has something for everyone, even warriors like me." He noted that while man's interactions have spread across a great spectrum, war is still the most popular means of settling conflict. SALT II and arms negotiations are just short-term means for avoiding a nuclear war, Weymouth said, the Peace Academy offers a long-term commitment.

Bruce Bishop, the Deputy Director of the National Peace Academy Foundation and a former Foreign Service officer, said that the Peace Academy would train future leaders in a great variety of professions from around the world in the process of settling disputes.

Pointing to the "Old Boy" networks which exist in many professions, he said that potential leaders will be brought together at the Academy to study and discuss methods of peace. In future years, when they find themselves facing each other across a negotiations table, they will already have a common ground of understanding, a place to start.

Mr. President, the Peace Academy proposal which Admiral Weymouth and Mr. Bishop so eloquently spoke in support of in Houston is embodied in S. 564, the U.S. Academy of Peace Act. This bill, which I introducted in February 1983, now has 55 cosponsors and has won the endorsement of over 50 national organizations. In September 1983, it was favorably reported by the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee after public hearings and lengthy consideration during markup. It is now awaiting consideration by the full Senate, and, inasmuch as it does have the support of the majority of the Senate, I am urging the leadership to schedule it for early floor consideration, just as I have on many previous occasions.

With the thought that my colleagues will find of interest a report on the remarks of Admiral Weymouth and Mr. Bishop, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article which appeared on the front page of the March 1984 edition of the Journal of Foreign Affairs, a publication of the Gulf Coast Council on Foreign Affairs.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PEACE ACADEMY TO TRAIN FUTURE LEADERS IN CONFLICT RESOLUTION

Bring the best minds from various professions and countries around the world, put them in one place where the knowledge and experience man has accumulated about peace is centralized in one location; teach them, train them in the techniques of conflict resolution. This is the goal of the proposed National Peace Academy.

Does it sound like an impossible dream or an idea that has found its time? The National Peace Academy Foundation hopes the latter is the answer. It is pushing for Senate Bill 564 to be approved this year. It is possible that the senate bill may be put on the March calendar.

Two representatives of the foundation were in Houston, February 15 and 16 to speak to council members and other attendants about the academy.

Vice Admiral Ralph Weymouth, (ret) and Bruce Bishop, Deputy Director of the National Academy Foundation said that the legislation already has a great deal of support from the Congress, individuals and other nations.

If adopted, the academy would provide a center for research and learning about conflict resolution. Located in Washington, D.C., the academy would be federally funded and would also seek private endowments to defray cost. The budget for the first two years would be 23 and a half million dollars. The foundation would be required to appear before congress every two years with a budget request.

Opponents of the Foundation proposal have written a resolution of their own which would assign the theme of the academy of a department or agency already existing within the government framework. Both sides agree that money should be made available for such a program. The difference of opinion is centered around the framework of the organization.

Weymouth said, "I'm a warrior and I think it is important to note that the Academy has something for everyone, even warriors like me." He said that man's interactions have spread across a great spectrum, but the most popular means of settling a conflict is still war. Whereas, the Academy may not be able to teach solutions, it can teach alternatives to using force.

Weymouth said that Salt II and arms negotiations are just short term means for avoiding a nuclear war. The Academy offers a long commitment. Bishop said that the Academy would achieve this by training the future leaders in a great variety of professions from around the world in the process of settling a dispute.

He compares the "Old Boy" networks which exist throughout most professional occupations. Potential leaders will be brought together at the Academy to study and discuss methods of peace. In future years, when they find themselves facing each other across a negotiations table, they will already have a common ground of understanding, a place to start.

Another example of the practical application of the study would be briefings for professionals who are being sent to a different region of the world. For example, a journalist being sent to cover the crisis in the Middle East, could first attend a session at the Academy, he would learn the history of the conflicts and what negotiations have been tried. This knowledge would later be put to use when the journalist is writing or filming reports for the media back home. An understanding of what brought about present circumstances will allow him to report current events more accurately.

In order for the National Peace Academy to succeed, Bishop said that it must be independent, interdisciplinary and international. "The perception of the Peace Academy must be that it is not an extension of the government; that it is not a proxy for the C.I.A. or the Department of State or the Arms Control and Disarmament agency," he said. To make it a part of those departments or agencies would be self-defeating.

Only one Texan, Charles Wilson, (Dem.), is officially listed as being a sponsor of the house bill for the Academy. None of the senators from Texas are listed as sponsors of the senate bill.

Bishop and Weymouth said that people who wish to contribute to the campaign for the Academy can write letters to their congressmen. Donations of any amount are also needed. For more information or to make a contribution, write the National Peace Academy Foundation, 1346 Connecticut Ave., N.W., No. 519, Washington, D.C. 20036.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. ANDREWS (by request):

S. 2529. A bill to extend and amend programs under the Native American Programs Act of 1974, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. GLENN:

S. 2530. A bill to establish labor productivity assistance loans to provide financial assistance to certain individuals, to increase job skills and productivity, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

By Mr. HEINZ:

S. 2531. A bill to extend the statute of limitations for fraud under the customs laws and to clarify the extent of Government access to grand jury proceedings; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. DODD, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. BYRD and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S. 2532. A bill entitled the "Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984"; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ANDREWS (by request):

S. 2529. A bill to extend and amend programs under the Native American Programs Act of 1974, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

EXTENSION AND EXPANSION OF NATIVE AMERICANS PROGRAMS ACT FOR 3 YEARS

● Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I am introducing at the request of the administration legislation that would extend and expand the Native Americans Program Act for 3 additional years. I, along with 15 of my colleagues previously introduced S. 2184, the Native American Programs Act Amendments of 1983, which would also reauthorize the current act for 3 more years. The programs administered under the Native Americans Program Act has had a positive impact in helping native American families move toward self-sufficiency. Because of the success these programs have had in helping break the cycle of poverty, the administration is seeking a simple extension of this act through fiscal year 1987.

The administration's proposed bill would make one substantive change in the program by removing the restriction that limits participation in projects to nonprofit organizations. It is the administration's view that allowing for-profit organizations to compete for funding under the act would expand the quantity, quality, and range of services to native Americans. For-profit hospitals and home-health agencies are funded under various HHS programs, and have made significant contribitions to meeting the health needs of all Americans. The administration believes that attracting for-profit organizations to the field of social services will also be beneficial to our long-range goal of improving the quality of life for all Americans.

Reauthorization of the existing law will enable the administration for native Americans' strategy for social and economic development to continue to make a measurable impact on self-sufficiency for native Americans.

A recent evaluation study conducted by the Office of Human Development Services examines the impact of Federal dollars invested in social and economic development projects. The evaluation demonstrated that the payoff ratio ranged from $3 to $43 for each Federal dollar invested. The evaluation suggests that projects funded by the administration for native Americans are cost-effective, and are making progress in overcoming longstanding and acute social problems.

This program has helped tribes and Indian communities put people to work in nonsubsidized employment. It has brought about private sector participation in the reservations and with urban Indian communities as well. The policy of funding social and economic development strategies allows maximum local flexibility for self-determination and provides for marshaling and directing Federal, State, local, tribal, or organizational resources toward local objectives while avoiding duplication in funding and programs. The focus is on the greatest impact on social and economic self-sufficiency.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the letter from Secretary Heckler transmitting this proposal to Congress, and the text of the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2529

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SECTION 1. Section 814 of the Native American Programs Act of 1974 (42 U.S.C. 2992d) is amended by striking out "such sums as may be necessary for fiscal years 1979 through 1981" and inserting in lieu thereof "$28,000,000 for fiscal year 1985, $28,644,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $29,259,000 for fiscal year 1987".

ELIMINATION OF BARRIERS TO USE OF PROFIT-MAKING ENTITIES FOR PROGRAM PURPOSES

SEC. 2. Subsection (a) of section 803 of the Native American Programs Act of 1974 (42 U.S.C. 2991b) is amended by striking out "nonprofit private agencies" and inserting in lieu thereof "private entities".

SECRETARY OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES,
Washington, D.C., March 27, 1984.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
President of the Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed for the consideration of the Congress is a draft bill "To extend and amend programs under the Native American Programs Act of 1974, and for other purposes."

The draft bill would extend for three years, through fiscal year 1987, the authorization of appropriations for programs under the Act. Appropriations would be authorized of $28,000,000 for fiscal year 1985, $28,644,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $29,259,000 for fiscal year 1987.

The draft bill would also amend a provision which restricts participation in projects related to the purposes of the Act to public or nonprofit private agencies or organizations, in order to permit participation by for-profit entities as well. This will increase competition and should improve quality by allowing selection from a greater number of proposed projects.

We urge that the Congress give the draft bill its prompt and favorable consideration.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that enactment of this legislative proposal would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

MARGARET M. HECKLER,
Secretary.●

By Mr. GLENN:

S. 2530. A bill to establish labor productivity assistance loans to provide financial assistance to certain individuals, to increase job skills and productivity, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

LABOR PRODUCTIVITY ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, we have problems facing many people in this country that are very difficult for them to deal with these days. If you are an unemployed steelworker in Youngstown, Ohio, and your unemployment benefits have run out, or if you are a displaced homemaker, one who has either lost a spouse or been divorced or put out on her own with little or no job training, been a homemaker all of that person's life, or if you are a person who has been underemployed, or if you are in a declining industry where you can see the handwriting on the wall as to what is going to happen in the future, and you know that what you have to look forward to is probably being out of a job and, after your unemployment insurance has run out, maybe even out of hope about what kind of life you can have in the future for yourself and your family, the term "desperate" does not overstate the situation.

We have all too many people in this country today who face exactly that situation. Many of our industries in this country are industries that have had to let a lot of people go. In many of those industries, those people realize fully that there never will be the same level of employment again in those industries as there was in the past.

How do they relocate? We cannot expect the unions to have a fund that will help them retrain and relocate. A declining company can hardly be expected to put enough money aside in a very bad financial situation in which they may find themselves. It has been an increasing need as we have found the pattern of employment in the country changing more rapidly than ever in our history, and probably changing more rapidly into the future than it has to the current time. Whole industries come to fruition in maybe 3 to 5 years, certainly 8 to 10 years, and other industries go down in this Nation of ours. As we move more into some of the high tech areas, we still retain the requirement for our old smokestack industries, but we see that to be competitive they must automate and be more productive. Sometimes that means less requirement for actual people on the job in those old smokestack industries even though new jobs are being provided in some of the newer industries.

What happens to those people who do not have substantial savings or wherewithal or the borrowing power to retrain and relocate?

This is a nation of opportunity, and we pride ourselves on giving a fair chance to every single person. Too often those people are out of a job, out of money, and out of hope.

Mr. President, I think we can do better than that. Therefore, I am pleased to introduce legislation today to create a training trust fund to provide retraining loans to dislocated workers, to displaced homemakers, underemployed individuals, and persons employed in declining industries.

Even though the unemployment rate has fallen as of late, there are still over 9 million Americans unemployed, and the dampening effect of high-interest rates does not bode well for continued declines.

Furthermore, the accelerating pace of technological change is having a tremendous effect on the workplace and on careers. Over the last decade, there has been a very substantial change in the industrial composition of the U.S. work force. The plant closings which have plagued our industrial sector are but a harbinger of the upheaval you can expect as technology continues to advance at an ever-increasing pace.

So it is no longer enough, Mr. President, to provide temporary jobs or income maintenance just to help people over the rough times of short-term unemployment, expecting that they will automatically go back to work sometime in a business cycle upturn in that same industry. More and more, permanent job displacement has shattered the economic security of American families. In this age of industrial change, lifelong training—in other words, a lifelong educational system, a lifelong retraining system that goes well beyond just elementary and secondary or even college availability—must become the norm rather than the exception to the rule. We must insure that retraining is available to individuals who face permanent layoffs, chronic unemployment, and other types of relatively permanent barriers to productive employment.

To this end, I am proposing the Labor Productivity Assistance Act to provide retraining loans of up to $10,000 to individuals who are dislocated workers, displaced homemakers, underemployed, or employed in declining industries. These loans could be used to pay for up to 2 years of retraining and subsistence during the period of retraining, job search, and relocation—$500 million a year will be available for new loans. Repayment of a loan will begin 1 year after completion of an individual's training plan and will be amortized over a maximum of 12 years. No repayment will be required, however, until household income reaches at least 150 percent of the official poverty level.

That means people taking advantage of this act for retraining purposes will not be immediately hit with a repayment schedule that would be well beyond their capability and thus forced into bankruptcy just as they become newly employed. It would be collected after their household income reaches at least 150 percent of poverty level.

Workers who have lost their jobs due to economic and industrial changes which are beyond their control, women who are faced with the harsh economic realities of losing a spouse through separation or divorce or death, and persons who are unable to finance training which would allow them to emerge from low-paying, deadend jobs, would be given an opportunity to change their lives for the better, in the best tradition of this Nation where people are supposed to have the opportunity to upgrade themselves, that uniquely American phrase "opportunity to upgrade" themselves.

The loan program that I am proposing will give these individuals not only hope but also the financial resources to invest in their future. I emphasize this would not be a giveaway program. One hears words like that all the time. Every time some new program is proposed, it is termed a "giveaway" program of some kind. That is not what this program will be. It is a loan program. The loans will be repaid after the training is completed and the individual is back at work.

What the Labor Productivity Assistance Act offers is a handup, not a handout.

Although the Job Training Partnership Act provides some support to dislocated workers, the Congressional Budget Office has estimated that at current spending levels only 15 to 25 percent of dislocated workers will be helped. Furthermore, the other groups of workers may get little or no support through JTPA. Displaced homemakers, the underemployed, and workers employed in declining industries are not identified as JTPA target groups.

America's promise of opportunity can only be met through investments in training and education—investments that enable all workers to obtain the skills they need to rise as high and as far as their ambitions and talents can take them. This legislation, Mr. President, will help meet that promise—the promise of this Nation—and enable working men and women to realize their full potential by giving them an opportunity through times of difficulty as industrial changes occur.

The self-sustaining nature of the trust fund—and it would be self-sustaining. It would not be something that requires new appropriations. It would be an off-budget item—combined with the additional tax revenue that participants will generate through better, more productive jobs makes this program cost effective. It will have the additional advantages of providing individuals with the broadest possible choice of training programs, allowing them an added measure of self-esteem in knowing that they are receiving a loan and not a handout, and of being possibly the lowest cost method of providing retraining services.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2530

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Labor Productivity Assistance Act".

PURPOSES

SEC. 2. The purpose of this Act is to provide financial assistance through a low interest loan program that supplements existing job training programs for individuals who are unemployed, underemployed, displaced homemakers, or dislocated workers to upgrade job skills, learn new job skills, better their employment opportunities, and increase overall labor productivity.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used in this Act—

(1) the term "declining industry" means an industry which has experienced net employment declines over the most recent ten-year period for which data is available;

(2) the term "dislocated worker" means an individual who—

(A)(i) has been terminated or laid-off or has received a notice of termination or layoff from employment; and

(ii) is eligible for or has exhausted any unemployment compensation and is unlikely to return to his previous industry or occupation;

(B) has been terminated, or has received notice of termination of employment, as a result of the permanent closure of a plant or facility; or

(C)(i) is long-term unemployed;

(ii) is eligible for or has exhausted any unemployment compensation; and

(iii) has limited opportunities for employment (including those caused by substantial barriers to employment by reason of age) in the same or a similar occupation in which such individual was formerly employed, in the area in which such individual resides;

(3) the term "displaced homemaker" means an individual who—

(A) has not been employed for a substantial number of years, but has worked in the home providing unpaid services for family members during such years;

(B) has been dependent on the income of another family member, but is no longer supported by such income; and

(C) is unemployed or underemployed and experiencing difficulty in obtaining or upgrading employment;

(4) the term "loan" means a labor productivity assistance loan received pursuant to this Act;

(5) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Labor;

(6) the term "Trust Fund" means the Labor Productivity Trust Fund established pursuant to section 4;

(7) the term "Trustee" means the Secretary of the Treasury; and

(8) the term "underemployed individual" means an individual who—

(A) is employed part-time, but is seeking full-time employment; or

(B) is employed full-time but has an income below the poverty line established in accordance with section 673(c) of the Community Services Block Grant Act.

LABOR PRODUCTIVITY TRUST FUND

SEC. 4. (a) There is established on the books of the Treasury of the United States a trust fund to be known as the "Labor Productivity Trust Fund". The Trust Fund shall consist of such amounts as may be deposited in it pursuant to subsections (b) and (d) and such amounts as may be received pursuant to section 11(b)(1)(B). Amounts in the Trust Fund may be used only to carry out the provisions of this Act. The Secretary of the Treasury shall be the Trustee of the Trust Fund and shall report to the Congress not later than March 1 of each year on the operation and status of the Trust Fund during the preceding fiscal year.

(b)(1) The Trustee is authorized to issue to the Federal Financing Bank notes or other obligations in such forms and denominations, bearing such maturities, and subject to such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Federal Financing Bank, in an amount not to exceed $5,000,000,000 in total, and not to exceed $500,000,000 in any fiscal year. The proceeds from the issue of such obligations shall be deposited in the Trust Fund.

(2) Such notes or other obligations shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Federal Financing Bank, taking into consideration the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the Federal Financing Bank of comparable maturities during the month preceding the issuance of the notes or other obligations.

(3) The Federal Financing Bank is authorized and directed to purchase any notes and other obligations issued hereunder and may at any time sell any of the notes or other obligations acquired under this subsection. The receipts and disbursements of the Trust Fund shall not be included in the totals of the budget of the United States Government as submitted by the President or of the congressional budget and shall be exempt from any general budget limitation imposed by statute on expenditures and net lending (budget outlays) of the United States Government.

(c) It shall be the duty of the Trustee to invest such portion of the Fund as is not, in his judgment, required to meet current withdrawals. Such investments may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States or in obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States. For such purpose, such obligations may be acquired on original issue at the issue price, or by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price.

(d) Any obligation acquired by the Trust Fund may be sold by the Trustee at the market price. The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, any obligation held in the Trust Fund shall be credited to and form a part of the Trust Fund.

EXPENDITURES FROM THE TRUST FUND

SEC. 5. (a) The Trustee shall transfer funds in each fiscal year out of the Trust Fund to the Secretary in such amounts as are necessary to carry out the functions of this Act, subject to the limitations of section 4(b). The funds so transferred shall be available for making loans and for the payment of administrative expenses under this Act.

(b) The Trustee shall make such expenditures from the Trust Fund as he determines necessary for the redemption of such notes and obligations issued pursuant to section 4.

4. ALLOCATION OF FUNDS FROM THE TRUST FUND

SEC. 6. To the maximum extent possible, the Secretary shall allocate funds from the Trust Fund among States based upon the allocation set forth in section 301(b) of the Job-Training Partnership Act relating to the allocation of assistance for dislocated workers.

ELIGIBILITY REQUIREMENTS FOR LOANS

SEC. 7. (a) The Secretary shall promulgate regulations for the certification of eligible individuals identified pursuant to subsections (b) and (e).

(b) The Secretary may use the local offices of the United States Employment Service in each State or the private industry councils established pursuant to section 102 of the Job Partnership Training Act to identify and certify any individual eligible to receive a loan.

(c) An individual is eligible to receive a loan if the individual is—

(1) (A) a dislocated worker;

(B) a displaced homemaker;

(C) employed in a declining industry; or

(D) underemployed; and

(2) at least twenty-five years of age.

(d) Each certified individual shall comply with the provisions of section 8 before a private industry council may approve a loan for such individual.

(e) Notwithstanding subsection (c) the private industry councils in reviewing loan applications pursuant to section 8, may modify the eligibility requirements and certify individuals in 5 per centum of the loan applications.

LABOR PRODUCTIVITY ASSISTANCE LOANS

SEC. 8. (a) Each certified individual desiring to receive a loan shall—

(1) receive counseling from the appropriate private industry council regarding the loan program;

(2) develop a written plan, with the assistance of the appropriate private industry council, for the use of a loan designed for the individualized needs of such individual which shall include—

(A) the employment goal of the individual;

(B) the specific training, counseling service, or other activities for which assistance is sought, consistent with section 10;

(C) the amount to be borrowed;

(D) the specific starting and completion date of the training or counseling sought, which shall not exceed a duration of two years;

(E) the repayment schedule of a loan; and

(F) the specific use of a loan for any authorized activity under section 10; and

(3) submit an application which fully discloses the household income and assets, in accordance with uniform criteria established by the Secretary.

(b) A private industry council shall—

(1) approve the loan application and written plan of any certified individual if it determines—

(A) such application and written plan are in compliance with subsection (a); and

(B) approval of such loan application and written plan would further the purposes of this Act;

(2) monitor the progress of an individual receiving a loan in accordance with the written plan developed under subsection (a) (2) on at least a semiannual basis; and

(c) Any individual who is receiving unemployment benefits, shall not have such benefits reduced or suspended because such individual receives a loan under this Act.

TERMS OF LABOR PRODUCTIVITY ASSISTANCE LOANS

SEC. 9. (a) A loan shall not exceed $10,000 in aggregate per household, whether received as a single loan or as an additional loan to any other loan made under this Act.

(b) Each loan under this Act shall—

(1) be made only if a certified individual has complied with the provisions of section 8 and such loan has been approved by the appropriate private industry council; and

(2) be evidenced by a note or other written agreement which—

(A) provides for repayment of the principal amount of the loan in installments over a period of not more than twelve years, beginning the later of—

(i) one year after the date of the completion of the authorized activity approved in a recipient's plan pursuant to section 8(b)(1), unless such recipient requests repayment to begin on an earlier date; or

(ii) one month after the date which such individual has an income in an amount that is equal to or exceeds 150 per centum of the poverty line established in accordance with section 673(c) of the Community Services Block Grant Act;

(B) provides for interest on the unpaid principal balance of the loan at a yearly rate, not exceeding the average rate of return established for fifty-two week Treasury bills, in the most recent calendar quarter ended preceding the date of the loan, plus 2 per centum, which interest shall be payable in installments over the period of the loan except that, if provided in the note or other written agreement, any interest payable by the recipient may be deferred until not later than the date upon which repayment of the first installment of principal falls due, in which case interest that has so accrued during that period may be added on that date to the principal;

(C) provides that in the event of death or permanent and total disability of the recipient, as determined in accordance with regulations promulgated by the Secretary, the Secretary may modify the terms of a loan or discharge the debt of such a recipient; and

(D) entitles the recipient to accelerate without penalty repayment of the whole or any part of the loan.

(c) The Secretary shall discharge a debt on a loan pursuant to section 523(a)(10)(B) of title 11, United States Code, in the event of the death of the debtor and—

(1) a determination by the Secretary that an undue hardship exists; or

(2) the estate of the debtor has a net worth less than $50,000.

(d) Section 523 (a) of title 11, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) striking out "or" at the end of paragraph (8);

(2) striking out the period at the end of paragraph (9) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or"; and

(3) adding at the end thereof the following:

"(10) for a labor productivity assistance loan made, insured, or guaranteed by a governmental unit pursuant to section 8 of the Labor Productivity Assistance Act of 1983, unless—

"(A) such loan first became due before five years (exclusive of any applicable suspension of the repayment period) before the date of the filing of the petition; or

"(B) excepting such debt from discharge under this paragraph will impose an undue hardship on the debtor and the debtor's dependents.".

AUTHORIZED ACTIVITIES

SEC. 10. A certified individual may be approved for a loan pursuant to section 8 for—

(1) employment search assistance;

(2) training in job skills, including any two year college program;

(3) relocation assistance;

(4) a subsistence allowance; and

(5) participation in any program, approved by a private industry council, which is conducted by, or in cooperation with, an employer or labor organization to provide early assistance to any individual who is adversely affected in employment because of plant closures or labor force reductions by an employer.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 11. (a) The Secretary shall enter into agreements with the private industry councils, established pursuant to section 102 of the Job Training Partnership Act to administer the labor productivity assistance loan program authorized by this Act. Such agreements shall provide for the protection of the financial interest of the United States regarding such loan program.

(b) The Secretary may—

(A) prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act;

(B) modify any term, condition, or covenant of any loan to protect the financial interest of the United States; or

(C) consent to modification, with respect to rate of interest, time of payment of any installment of principal and interest or any portion thereof, or any other provision of any note or other instrument evidencing a loan;

(D) enforce, pay, compromise, waive, or release any right, title, claim, lien, or demand, however acquired, including any equity or any right of redemption, subject to section 9(c);

(E) enter into a contract or other arrangement with State or nonprofit agencies and, on a competitive basis, with collection agencies for servicing and collection of loans under this Act; and

(F) sue and be sued in any court of record of a State having general jurisdiction or in any district court of the United States, and such district courts shall have jurisdiction of civil actions arising under this part without regard to the amount in controversy, and action instituted under this subsection by or against the Secretary shall survive notwithstanding any change in the person occupying the office of Secretary or any change in the person occupying the office of Secretary or any vacancy in that office; but no attachment, injunction, garnishment, or other similar process, mesne or final, shall be issued against the Secretary or property under his control and nothing herein shall be construed to except litigation arising out of activities under this Act from the application of sections 509, 517, 547, and 2679 of title 28 of the United States Code.

(c) Collection of loan payments shall be made in accordance with procedures established by the Secretary of the Treasury, utilizing the IRS.

By Mr. HEINZ:

S. 2531. A bill to extend the statute of limitations for fraud under the customs laws and to clarify the extent of Government access to grand jury proceedings to the Committee on Finance.

IMPORT FRAUD

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, for some time now I have been engaged in an effort to increase the enforcement capabilities of the U.S. Customs Service against steel import fraud. This activity has become pervasive as a means for importers to circumvent U.S. trade laws and international steel agreements. Increases in both the frequency of incidence and variations in the types of fraud committed have been registered by import specialists of the Customs Service. The widespread nature of the problem is evident in the fact that the Customs Service presently has 30 class-one, high priority cases open involving the importation of steel by fraudulent methods.

I am pleased to report today, that the Customs Service has recently undertaken a major initiative to combat violations in this problem area which will go a long way toward deterring steel import fraud and I ask, Mr. President, that the text of the announcement outlining this initative be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

However, problems still remain which inhibit Customs ability to prosecute violators under civil statutes after they are caught, and it is under civil statutes that penalties large enough to deter violators or potential violators can be imposed.

First, because Customs attorneys wait until the U.S. attorneys finish with criminal proceedings before beginning a civil suit, they often run out of time before they can properly pursue a civil case. Presently, the statute of limitations governing Customs' activities which is contained in 19 U.S.C. 1621, requires that cases in which there is only enough evidence to show negligence or gross negligence be finished within 5 years from the date of violation. Cases where there is enough evidence to charge fraud on the other hand are allowed 5 years from date of discovery. Since it is often some time between when a violation is committed and when it is discovered, (even several years), the statute of limitations for negligence and gross negligence places a severe constraint on Customs attorneys. In some cases, even though the prosecution has developed enough evidence to demonstrate fraud in the criminal case using a grand jury, civil division attorneys run out of time under the statute before they can petition for access to that evidence. The bill I am introducing today makes the statute of limitations governing such cases a uniform 5 years from date of discovery, thereby giving Customs attorneys more time to gain access to grand jury materials in those cases where initial investigation only yields enough evidence to show negligence—or gross negligence.

The second problem facing Customs attorneys is the consequence of two recent Supreme Court decisions (U.S. against Sells Engineering and U.S. against Baggot) which have made it difficult for them to gain access to evidence developed by criminal prosecutors through a grand jury. Without such access, Customs attorneys often must begin a civil case from scratch. This is an unacceptable waste of Government resources which allows violators to escape the burden of full penalties.

The particular problem faced by Customs attorneys arises from a criterion imposed in the Baggot case. Specifically, in order to gain access, Customs attorneys must demonstrate that they are "preliminary to a judicial proceeding." But, the Court declined to describe what point in the Customs administrative procedure constituted "preliminary to." Mr. President, my legislation clears up the ambiguity left in the wake of the Court's decision by amending 19 U.S.C. 1592, the statute which governs Customs activities in this regard to designate a prepenalty notice issued in the course of Customs Service civil procedure as preliminary to a judicial procedure.

There are, of course, more general problems which have been caused by the Court's decision to limit the Government's access to grand jury evidence for use in civil procedures. I am, therefore, considering legislation which will address this question on a broader basis. For the purposes of incresing the enforcement capabilities of the Customs Service, however, the bill which I am introducing today will simply clarify what they must demonstrate in a petition for such access.

Mr. President, the changes which I have proposed in civil statutes will allow the Customs Service to impose the maximum penalty on companies found to be in violation of U.S. trade law. They will result in higher level of deterrence against steel import fraud and enhance the effectiveness of the Customs initiative which is currently underway.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill along with a copy of my testimony on this problem before the Commerce and Energy Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation on September 21, 1983 be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2531

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 621 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1621) is amended by—

(1) striking our the first proviso; and

(2) striking out "Provided further" and inserting in lieu thereof "Provided".

SEC. 2. Section 592 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1592) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) GRAND JURY MATTERS.—For purposes of Rule 6(e)(3)(C)(i) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, disclosure otherwise prohibited by such rule of matters occurring before the grand jury may be made to the government upon a showing by the government that—

"(1) a prepayment penalty notice has been issued under subsection (b)(1) of this section; and

"(2) the evidence sought may be relevant to the enforcement of this section.".

PRESS STATEMENT FOR COMMISSIONER WILLIAM VON RAAB

Effective today, the United States Customs Service will step up its efforts against fraudulent steel importing practices at a number of locations around the country. We will be staffing up both import specialists and special agents in those areas and ports which represent the bulk of our steel imports.

Two steel fraud task forces which are now operating out of Houston, Texas and Portland, Oregon will serve as models for a new task force that is being established today in Los Angeles, California. Additionally, effective immediately, Customs officers are being assigned to Customs Headquarters in Washington, D.C. and to Detroit, Michigan to support this effort.

These new efforts will be part of the overall Customs fraud crackdown "Operation Tripwire" which has successfully targeted product counterfeiting, quota evasion, undervaluation, and other fraudulent practices. We will use the broadest possible use of our civil authority against violations of our country's fraud laws to ensure a fair market place for steel products.

PENNSYLVANIA SENATOR AND COMMISSIONER OF CUSTOMS ANNOUNCE STEEL FRAUD CRACKDOWN

Senator John Heinz (R-Pennsylvania) and Commissioner of Customs William von Raab today jointly announced that effective April 2, 1984, the United States Customs Service would step up its efforts against fraudulent steel importing practices at a number of locations around the country.

The new effort will be part of the overall Customs fraud crackdown "Operation Tripwire" which was announced last September. Operation Tripwire has successfully targeted product counterfeiting, quota evasion, undervaluation and other fraudulent practices in a variety of commodities such as textiles, electronics and coffee.

Commenting on the crackdown, Senator Heinz, who is the chairman of the Senate Steel Caucaus, said, "the Commissioner and his staff are to be commended for their earnest efforts to beef up this most critical program which will certainly result in a decrease in fraudulent steel imports. We're sending a strong signal to offenders that we do intend to vigorously enforce our laws. The steel industry in our country is already besieged left and right with steel imports; it cannot and should not have to contend with a substantial underground of illegal steel shipments as well."

Two steel fraud task forces are now operating out of Houston, Texas and Portland, Oregon which will serve as models for a new task force to be established April 2, in Los Angeles, California. Additional Customs officers are also being assigned to Customs Headquarters in Washington, D.C. and to Detroit, Michigan to support this effort. The Department of Justice has assigned five attorneys to prosecute criminal steel fraud cases. Customs has also established a "hot line" with the American Iron and Steel Institute to receive timely information on possible fraud violations.

Commissioner von Raab said "that Customs will be staffing up both import specialists and special agents in those ports and areas representing the bulk of our steel imports to ensure that sufficient enforcement resources are devoted to this task."

Customs inspectors will begin intensive examinations of steel shipments to check for violations such as false documents, misdescriptions of products and false country of origin markings. In addition, Customs import specialists will examine 100 percent of the documents associated with all steel shipments looking for possible indications of illegal practices. All of these efforts will be closely coordinated by the Customs Fraud Investigations Center in Washington.

Recently, Customs steel fraud investigations have uncovered major violations of U.S. law. In one case two companies pled guilty to charges relating to a scheme to circumvent the trigger price mechanism. The two companies paid criminal fines totalling $110,000 plus a civil penalty of over $2 million. In another case in Philadelphia an importer of steel flanges pled guilty of changing the marking on his imported product to read "Made in U.S.A." in order to command a higher price for an inferior product. On November 10, 1983, the Company pled guilty to a 33 count indictment and the exowner and president of the company also pled guilty to a 20 count indictment. And as recently as two weeks ago, nine officers of major Korean steel importers were indicted in Portland, Oregon for allegedly evading the Trigger Price Mechanism. Both the Korean parent company and its American subsidiary were also named in the indictment.

Commissioner von Raab said "Customs will use the broadest possible use of its civil authority against violations of our country's fraud laws. We do not take our responsibility lightly." He further said that "In the highly competitive steel industry, it is imperative that all manufacturers are assured a certain level of fair competition in the U.S. marketplace. It is the role of the U.S. Customs Service to enforce the law in order to assure that fairness." Customs is presently conducting over thirty "Class I" (high value/high priority) steel fraud investigations.

Products which are targeted by Customs fraud teams will include those under the Trigger Price Mechanism (1978-1982), the current specialty steel quotas, the current European Steel Arrangement, and a variety of anti-dumping and countervailing duty orders.

TESTIMONY BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE ON OVERSIGHT AND INVESTIGATION ON STEEL IMPORT FRAUD—FRAUD WITHOUT FEAR

I would first like to commend Chairman Dingell for his extensive investigation of import fraud in a number of sectors, including steel. It is a matter of serious concern not only to our ailing steel and support industries in the U.S. but also to our entire nation. My purpose today is to express support for your investigation, knowing that it will be thorough, constructive and fair, and to offer my help in developing a legislative response to the problems you uncover.

In developing that response, I'd like to share with you some of what I have learned in my own research and investigation. The word "steel" has become synonymous with tragedy. The industry has been dangerously weakened. Steel communites are deeply depressed. And steel workers are nearly without hope. A few years ago our steel industry was the strongest in the world. Today its sad statistics include 100,000 unemployed, $3.5 billion in losses last year, and a 56% operating rate despite the general economic recovery. It is a cruel injustice that many a job has been lost to fraudulently imported foreign steel.

A strong government effort at deterring fraud will certainly not alleviate all the problems of the industry but it will be of significant help. It is also worth noting that such an action is not a protectionist measure. It is simply a matter of justice, of enforcing our present laws.

Of course it is also a matter of revenue, since the Customs Officials generally take in $19 for every dollar spent.

Both the Customs Service and the Justice Department bear a serious responsibility for deficiencies in deterring steel import fraud. And the increase in fraudulently imported steel can be traced to a combination of insufficient resources, a low priority given to this problem, and unwillingness of both Customs and the Justice Department to emphasize prompt civil actions against such imports. I understand that there are currently over 40 active cases under investigation involving steel import fraud. Some of these cases date back to 5 to 7 years.

With respect to resources, Customs has compounded the problem by proposing a program to drastically reduce the manpower levels of import specialists at the same time it has proclaimed import fraud as an area of renewed emphasis. Import specialists are essential to fraud detection and they need additional support, not lip service. And they certainly do not need cut backs.

In addition, the physical equipment resources at U.S. ports to aid in fraud detection are almost non-existent. Currently, no ports except New Orleans possess on-site chemical analysis equipment or a Customs weighing system. This type of equipment—which is basic to effective enforcement—should be provided to all major steel ports.

Enforcement seems half-hearted. Looking at investigations and prosecutions already completed, I am disappointed in the size of the penalties levied. Substantial penalties are a key factor in deterrence. A mere slap on the wrist invites the greedy to try again and again . . . which they have successfully. Maximum penalties should be levied on offenders; especially those involving large foreign firms or trading companies. Instead of civil suits which are easier to win and allow bigger fines, the government has preferred Criminal investigations and prosecutions in large cases of steel fraud. Unfortunately, Justice Department policy effectively limits the maximum criminal fine $200,000 which is but a fraction of the profit a large company or trading company will make on the transaction. Of course, jail sentences are an alternative, but the Justice Department has not generally sought them.

Civil cases, on the other hand, can result in penalties as high as the value of the goods involved. This could result, in some cases, in multimillion dollar fines. The threat of such penalties would certainly be a greater deterrent, especially on foreign nationals with U.S. subsidiaries importing the steel. Further, the burden of proof for civil fraud is considerably less than that necessary for a successful criminal prosecution.

Unfortunately the government has consistently opted for the more difficult, less punitive (criminal) route. In sum, investigations proceed at a snail pace, fines are inconsequential, convictions rare, resources shrinking and the deterrent nil. Our government has unwittingly issued an invitation to "Fraud without fear."

Finally, we should all recognize that the likelihood of steel import fraud is greater today than it has ever been. The worldwide recession coupled with persistent steel oversupply and overcapacity has led to fierce competition, to push steel through the path of least resistance, i.e., the open U.S. market. Moreover, the October, 1982, Steel Agreement and the recent specialty steel import restraints offer ingenious exporters many opportunities for fraudulent circumvention such as misdesignating the country of origin, grade misidentification, etc. I understand that Secretary of Commerce Baldrige has stated that aggressive enforcement of out trade laws could limit steel imports to 15 percent of the U.S. market. I look forward to that aggressive effort. Meanwhile, we must continue our efforts to tighten up fraud detection in the face of these increased import pressures.

With respect to solutions, the Senate Finance Committee has already approved my amendment to increase the budget of Customs' steel fraud program. That proposal should also be included in the Treasury Customs Service Appropriation. I am also preparing a resolution to address both the resource problem and the need for stiffer penalties which I will shortly submit to the Senate.

These hearings today and tomorrow should awaken the Congress and the public to the problem of steel import fraud and will be a significant aid in obtaining legislative remedies. I am committed to work with you, Mr. Chairman, in developing and enacting such remedies.●

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself, Mr. DODD, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. BYRD, and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S. 2532. A bill entitled the "Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984"; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

COMPUTER EDUCATION ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1984

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, the quality of American education is vital to the strength of our Nation. Our competitive position in the international economy is dependent on the ability of this country to produce well-educated, skilled, and creative workers. We must provide adequate resources to support top notch education of our children or be prepared to face the consequences. Many educational and industrial leaders have noted that our schools are falling behind in this task and that American education needs to be reinvigorated.

Computer education will be part of that reinvigoration process. Last September, I introduced legislation to establish a program of Federal assistance for schools to develop and improve computer education programs. I considered that bill, S. 1849, a working draft, subject to changes and improvements based on the suggestions and recommendations of educators, parents, legislators, and other concerned citizens. The bill that I am introducing today, along with my colleagues Senators DODD, KENNEDY, BYRD, and MOYNIHAN is the result of the consultation process. It provides an improved path to the same goals articulated in the earlier version of the bill.

The Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984 continues to provide for a competitive grant program for planning, purchase of computer hardware and software, and teacher-training. It maintains the emphasis of S. 1849 on careful planning for the incorporation of computer education in the school curriculum.

The revised version of the bill also places emphasis on the importance of teacher-training and research for the use of computers in schools by drawing heavily on provisions in S. 1869, introduced last year by Senator DODD and H.R. 3750, sponsored by Representative WIRTH. One new section of the bill authorizes assistance for teacher-training institutes for elementary and secondary school teachers. The second new section of the bill provides for evaluation of computer hardware and software and the development of new software. The development of model instructional programs is also authorized.

At a time when new Federal expenditures are viewed with great skepticism, the kind of investment I am proposing will pay for itself many times over in a more productive citizenry. This investment is particularly important in schools with concentrations of poverty-level children who must not be deprived of the benefits of a modernized curriculum.

Computer education is no substitute for the three R's. Putting computers in the classroom is not a panacea for the problems of American education. But, carefully designed computer education programs can clearly help. This is why planning for the appropriate role of computer education is as important as buying new hardware and software. Thoughtful consideration must be given to the integration of computers into the curriculum. Computer education planners must first consider the overall goals for their school. Then, they must decide how computers can help them meet those goals. For some purposes, old, tried, and true methods will continue to be best. For other purposes, computers offer exciting possibilities for transforming the curriculum and the way it is taught.

Computers can be used by students in every subject in every grade. Students can use word processing programs to improve their writing by editing and revising more easily than they do now. They can learn to simulate "what if" situations in history classes so that they can understand more clearly the factors that affect human behavior and events. They can learn to use graphics to present data in a clear and meaningful way.

These uses of the computer in schools would go far beyond the teaching of computer literacy—a basic understanding of how a computer works and how to operate it—and programing. Computer literacy in school should be a beginning for computer education, not an end. Computers are more like pencils than books. As educators come to view computers in this way, as tools, they will begin using them in exciting and mind-expanding ways which is their true promise.

Thinking of computer education in broader terms will require coordination with curriculum planning. It is more than computer literacy, programing, and drill and practice programs. Once children learn how to operate a computer, they should have access to a wide range of application software for use in word processing, spread sheet analysis, and data base analysis, all of which can be used more generally than highly specialized instructional courseware.

Use of computers in schools is growing, but the need for Federal seed money is convincing. From the fall of 1980 to the spring of 1982, the number of microcomputers in public schools tripled. By early 1983 slightly over half of all public schools had at least one microcomputer.

However, although more than half the Nation's schools have at least one microcomputer, that is also the most that a large number of these schools have. Furthermore, little is known about the kind and amount of software or courseware that these schools are using with their computers.

A recent study, using January 1983 data, looked at the amount of time that microcomputers are actually used in schools. Looking only at the schools which reported at least one microcomputer, the survey found relatively few students obtaining access to the computers and for relatively short periods.

In elementary schools, 16 percent of the students used the computer in a week and 13 percent used one in secondary schools. The students who did use the computer spent 20 minutes a week in elementary schools and 45 minutes a week in secondary schools. These figures are for the median school, so some students had more access, some less.

To understand how small this amount of access is, consider what it would mean if students spent so little time with either pencil and paper or textbooks. The computer revolution in the schools is in its infancy, despite the enormous press coverage.

The Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984 will establish a program to assist States and local school districts in developing the ambitious computer education program that is needed. The program will authorize $150 million a year for the first 4 years and such sums as necessary for an additional 3 years for grants to schools for planning, acquisition of hardware and software, and teacher training. The funds will be allocated to the States half on the basis of the school age population and half on the basis of the title I formula, used for aid to disadvantaged schoolchildren. Each State will make grants to local school districts, which must assure that at least half the funds are used to serve title I eligible children and that funds are targeted on schools with the greatest need for computers.

School districts will be required to do some fairly extensive planning. This will include:

Setting goals for computer education in the schools and relating these goals to the overall educational objectives of the district;

Instructional priorities for the use of computers;

Schedules for placing computers in the elementary and secondary schools;

Criteria for selection of the hardware and software;

Planned revisions in the basis curricula of the schools designed to incorporate the use of computers; and

After school availability of the computers for use by parents and students.

The Federal grants are to be matched, with the Federal share set at 75 percent and the non-Federal at 25 percent. The non-Federal share can come from public or private sources, and may be in cash or kind. Local districts that can make arrangements with businesses and industries to donate equipment, personnel, or cash will not have to use their own funds for the matching share. Private school students would be eligible for assistance.

The bill provides $20 million a year for 7 years to the National Science Foundation for the establishment of teacher-training institutes. These institutes would provide more indepth training for teachers than the inservice training that the title I grants will support. Proper preparation of teachers is crucial to the success of a computer education program. These institutes will offer teachers an opportunity to learn about computers and the best methods for using them in the schools.

Evaluations of existing hardware and software and research and development on new software and instructional models will provide much of the underpinning for new programs of computer education. Title III of this bill authorizes the National Science Foundation to provide assistance to organizations that have expertise to carry out this research.

The planning requirement in this legislation is extremely important. Schools need to take a careful look at the role of computers in the total curriculum. They also need to consider such questions as whether to institute saturation programs at a limited number of schools or to provide computers in every classroom in a particular grade throughout the district. The bill does not set a goal for a specific ratio of students to computers or daily access time per student.

Plans are to include afterschool availability of computers for parents and children. This would permit parents and children to spend additional time working on the computers and gaining familiarity with them. Such afterschool programs would be especially helpful to those without access to computers at home. The children who do not have computers at home are very likely also attending schools which are least likely to have computers.

The benefits of the growth in computers are not evenly distributed among schools serving different socioeconomic groups. One study has found that 70 percent of the schools in more affluent areas had at least one microcomputer, while only 40 percent of the schools in poorer areas were so equipped. Another study found that twice as many students in well-to-do urban areas said that they had ever used a computer in school as students in disadvantaged urban areas. The number of computers in homes far exceeds the number in schools and the lion's share of those computers are in more affluent homes, including many with children. The additional exposure to computers in the home creates further disparity between rich and poor children.

The funds under the Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984 will be used in all schools, but at least half the funds will be targeted on schools with poverty-level children. Priority also is to be given to schools with the greatest need for computers. By establishing the targeting requirement and the priority for underserved schools, the bill aims to concentrate its resources in a way that benefits schools and children that are falling behind in computer usage. Funds will be allocated to the States half on the basis of school age children and half on the basis of the number of poverty-level children.

The grant funds can be used for planning, acquisition of hardware and software, and teacher-training. Each district will decide the mix of uses to which they will put their funds. This provides school districts with a great deal of flexibility.

In addition, the non-Federal matching share can be in-kind, such as donations of equipment or personnel services from private sources or from public agencies. This provides additional flexibility and an incentive for local school districts to involve the business community in their planning.

Mr. President, the program of planning and grant assistance for the purchase of equipment, training, and research authorized by this bill will provide Federal seed money for computer education programs. A great deal of flexibility is allowed and the result should be a better education for all children. This result is important for the growth and success of our children and our country.

I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section summary and the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2532

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984".

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to improve and strengthen computer education instruction in elementary and secondary schools and thereby to improve student's academic performance in both technical and other fields by—

(1) encouraging orderly planning for the use of computers and for the application of computers to the instructional program of elementary and secondary schools;

(2) encouraging the acquisition of computer hardware for elementary and secondary schools having the greatest need;

(3) improvement of teacher training in computer education; and

(4) assisting in the development and acquisition of appropriate computer software.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used in this Act—

(1) the term "elementary school" has the same meaning given that term under section 198 (a) (7) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965;

(2) the term "institution of higher education" has the same meaning given that term under section 1201 (a) of the Higher Education Act of 1965;

(3) the term "local educational agency" has the same meaning given that term under section 198 (a) (10) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965;

(4) the term "secondary school" has the same meaning given that term under section 198 (a) (7) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965;

(5) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education;

(6) the term "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Northern Mariana Islands;

(7) the term "State educational agency" has the meaning given that term under section 198 (a) (17) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965;

(8) the term "computer hardware" means—

(A) a data processor which—

(i) can be programed in at least three standard computer languages;

(ii) has a random access memory capacity of at least sixteen thousand bytes; and

(iii) is or can be connected with a screen for visual display;

(B) in connection with such a data processor (i) a display screen, (ii) one or more disk or tape drives, (iii) peripheral equipment such as printers and communications devices; and

(C) any equipment necessary for the installation of equipment described in subparagraphs (A) and (B); and

(9) the term "computer software" means computer programs including programs of general applicability and programs of instructional courseware suitable for use in the education program of the elementary and secondary schools within the State, including programs and program materials necessary for the operation and maintenance of the computers.

TITLE I—ACQUISITION OF COMPUTER RESOURCES PROGRAM AUTHORIZED

SEC. 101. (a) The Secretary is authorized, in accordance with the provisions of this title, to make grants to States to pay the Federal share of the costs of strengthening and expanding computer education resources available in the elementary and secondary schools within the State.

(b) There are authorized to be appropriated $150,000,000 for the fiscal year 1985 and for each succeeding fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1988, and such sums as are necessary for the fiscal year 1989 and for each succeeding fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1991.

ALLOTMENT TO STATES; WITHIN STATE ALLOCATION

SEC. 102. (a)(1) From the sums appropriated to carry out this title for each fiscal year, the Secretary shall reserve 2 percent for payments to the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and the Northern Mariana Islands, to be allotted in accordance with their respective needs.

(2) From the remainder of such sums, the Secretary shall, subject to the provisions of subsection (b), allot to each State—

(A) an amount which bears the same ratio to one-half of such remainder as the school-age population of the State bears to the school-age population of all States, plus

(B) an amount which bears the same ratio to one-half of such remainder as the amount the State is eligible to receive under subpart 1 of part A of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (as modified by chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981) in the fiscal year for which the determination is made bears to the amount available to all States under such subpart 1.

(3) For the purpose of this subsection—

(A) the term "school-age population" means the population aged 5 through 17; and

(B) the term "States" includes the fifty States, and the District of Columbia.

(b) For the purpose of this section—

(1) the provisions of section 111(a)(3)(D) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, relating to the use of the survey of income and education data, shall not apply to the allotment of funds under paragraph (2) of subsection (a); and

(2) the provision of the third sentence of section 193(a) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, relating to the 85 percent hold harmless, shall not apply to the allotment of funds under paragraph (2) of subsection (a).

(c) The amount of any State's allotment under subsection (a) for any fiscal year to carry out this Act which the Secretary determines will not be required for that fiscal year to carry out this Act shall be available for reallotment from time to time, on such dates during that year as the Secretary may fix, to other States in proportion to the original allotments to those States under subsection (a) for that year but with such proportionate amount for any of those other States being reduced to the extent it exceeds the sum the Secretary estimates that State needs and will be able to use for that year; and the total of those reductions shall be similarly reallotted among the States whose proportionate amounts were not so reduced. Any amounts reallotted to a State under this subsection during a year shall be deemed a part of its allotment under subsection (a) for that year.

(d) The State educational agency shall allocate the allotment of the State to local educational agencies within the State having an application approved by the State in accordance with section 104 based on the factors described in clause (2) of section 104 (a), relating to the local applications.

USES OF FUNDS

SEC. 103. Grants under this title may be used for the payment of the Federal share of—

(1) planning activities designed to facilitate the use of Federal financial assistance under this title for the expansion of computer resources in the elementary and secondary schools within the State;

(2) the acquisition of computer hardware for use in the educational program in the elementary and secondary schools in the State, including services necessary for the operation and maintenance of the computer hardware;

(3) the conduct of teacher training programs designed to improve the quality of instruction in computer education and to expand the use of computers in the education program in the elementary and secondary schools in the State, with particular emphasis upon the use of seminars and inservice training and the use of specially trained teachers to train other teachers in the targeted schools of the local educational agency; and

(4) the acquisition of computer software.

STATE APPLICATION

SEC. 104. (a) Each State which desires to receive assistance under this Act shall file an application with the Secretary which—

(1) designates the State educational agency as the State agency responsible for the administration and supervision of programs assisted under this Act;

(2) provides assurances that the planning activities described in clause (1) of Section 103 will be carried out by the local educational agencies within the State and that not more than 10 percent of the amount available to each local educational agency within the State for the fiscal year 1985 and not more than 5 percent of such amount for fiscal year 1986 will be available only for such planning activities;

(3) provides assurances that the State—

(A) will use grants under this Act (i) so as to supplement the level of funds that would, in the absence of such funds, be made available from non-Federal sources for the purposes of the program for which assistance is sought; and (ii) in no case to supplant such funds from such non-Federal sources; and

(B) will not commingle funds made available under this Act with State funds;

(4) provides assurances that the State will not expend more than 10 percent of the funds available to it under this title for administration and oversight activities and for furnishing services to local educational agencies within the State necessary for the local educational agencies to carry out their responsibilities under this Act;

(5) provides assurances that the State, through the State educational agency or through intrastate resource and service centers or through a combination of the two, shall furnish services to local educational agencies within the State necessary for the local educational agencies to carry out their responsibilities under this title;

(6) provides assurances that the State educational agency will pay from non-Federal sources the non-Federal share of the cost to the State of the computer education program for which assistance is sought under this Act, together with an identification of the sources of the non-Federal support;

(7) provides that the application of each local educational agency applying for funds under this Act will not be denied without notice and opportunity for a hearing before the State educational agency; and

(8) provides such additional assurances as the Secretary deems necessary to assure compliance with the requirements of this Act.

(b)(1) An application filed by the State under subsection (a) shall be for a period not to exceed seven fiscal years and may be amended annually as may be necessary to reflect changes without filing a new application.

(2) The Secretary shall not disapprove an application submitted by the State educational agency without first affording notice and opportunity for a hearing.

LOCAL APPLICATIONS

SEC. 105. (a) A local educational agency may receive payments under this title for any fiscal year in which it has on file with the State educational agency an application which—

(1) identifies the computer hardware, computer software, and the teacher training programs available in the elementary and secondary schools in the local educational agency and sets forth the uses for which assistance is sought by the local educational agency;

(2)(A) provides assurances that of the payments made to the local educational agency in each fiscal year at least half of such funds shall be used to serve educationally disadvantaged children served under title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (as modified by the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981); and

(B) provides assurances that the local educational agency will provide the funds made available to the agency under this title in each fiscal year first to elementary and secondary schools of such agency with the greatest need for computer hardware, computer software, and teacher training;

(3) provides assurances that the local educational agency will carry out planning activities in accordance with clause (1) of section 103, including—

(A) the goals for computer education in the schools of such agency and how the goals relating to computer education relate to the education objectives of the local educational agency,

(B) instructional priorities for the use of computers,

(C) schedules for placing computers in the elementary and secondary schools of such agency selected in accordance with the provisions of clause (2)(B),

(D) criteria for selecting computer hardware and software to be acquired,

(E) planned revisions in the basic curricula of the elementary and secondary schools designed to integrate the use of computers,

(F) provisions for the security of the computers,

(G) after school availability of the computers for use by parents and students for instructional or educational purposes, and

(H) standards for the evaluation of the computer education program assisted under this Act;

(4) provides assurances that funds paid under this Act (A) will be used to supplement the levels of funds that would in the absence of such funds be made available from non-Federal sources for the purpose of the program for which assistance is sought; and (B) in no case as to supplant such funds from non-Federal sources;

(5) provides assurances that the local educational agency will pay from non-Federal sources the non-Federal share of the cost of the computer education program for which assistance is sought under this Act, together with an identification of the sources of the non-Federal support;

(6) agrees to keep such records and provide such information to the State educational agency as reasonably may be required for fiscal audit and program evaluation consistent with the responsibilities of the State educational agency under this Act;

(7) describe the programs and procedures which the local educational agency has developed to ensure the participation of parents in the establishment of its computer hardware acquisition program and in the development and implementation of a curriculum for the use of such hardware; and

(8) provides assurances that the agency will comply with the other provisions of this Act.

(b) One or more local educational agencies may jointly file an application under subsection (a).

(c) (1) The State educational agency may approve applications submitted under subsection (a) based upon the factors described in clause (2) of subsection (a) and secton 102 (d).

(2) An application filed by a local educational agency under subsecton (a) shall be for a period not to exceed seven fiscal years and may be amended annually as may be necessary to reflect changes without filing a new application.

PARTICIPATION OF CHILDREN ENROLLED IN PRIVATE SCHOOLS

SEC. 106. The provisions of section 557 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981 shall apply to the financial assistance made available under this title.

PAYMENTS; FEDERAL SHARE

SEC. 107. (a) From the amount allotted to each State pursuant to section 102, the Secretary shall, in accordance with the provisions of this Act, pay to the State an amount equal to the Federal share of the cost of the program to be assisted under this Act.

(b)(1) The Federal share for each fiscal year shall be 75 percent.

(2) Non-Federal contributions may be in cash or in kind, fairly evaluated, including plant, equipment, and services.

TITLE II—TEACHER TRAINING INSTITUTES

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION PROGRAM

SEC. 201. (a) From the amount appropriated pursuant to section 203 for any fiscal year, the National Science Foundation shall arrange, through grants and contracts with nonprofit professional scientific or engineering organizations, science museums, regional science education centers, consortia of local educational agencies, intrastate resource and service centers, and institutions of higher education (including community colleges), for the development and operation by such entities of short-term or regular session institutes for study to improve the qualifications of individuals who are engaged in or preparing to engage in the teaching, or supervising or training of teachers, in the use of computers for computer education instruction and other education programs in elementary and secondary schools.

(b) In making grants and contracts under subsection (a), the National Science Foundation shall give special consideration to applicants who will train teachers, or supervisors or trainers of teachers, serving or preparing to serve in elementary and secondary schools that enroll substantial numbers of culturally, economically, socially, and educationally disadvantaged youth or in programs for children of limited English language proficiency.

STIPENDS

SEC. 202. Each individual who attends an institute operated under the provisions of this title shall be eligible (after application therefor) to receive a stipend at the rate of $275 per week for the period of attendance at such institute.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 203. There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this title $20,000,000 for each of the fiscal years 1985 through 1991.

TITLE III—INFORMATION DISSEMINATION AND EVALUATION

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF EDUCATION

SEC. 301. (a) For the purpose of providing advice and technical assistance to State and local educational agencies on the expenditure of funds under title I of this Act and on the acquisition of suitable computer software, the Secretary of Education and the National Science Foundation, in accordance with an interagency agreement between the Secretary and the Foundation, shall—

(1) evaluate available computer hardware and software, in terms of its usefulness in the classroom;

(2) disseminate the results of such evaluation; and

(3) develop model computer educational software, and make such model software (and its design premises) available to computer software producers and distributors, teachers, and school administrators.

(b) The Secretary of Education shall carry out the functions required by this section through the National Institute of Education.

(c) The Secretary of Education and the Foundation are authorized to make grants and enter into contracts to carry out the functions described in clauses (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (a).

(d) There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year 1985 and for each succeeding fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1991.

PRIVATE EVALUATION AND DISSEMINATION CENTERS

SEC. 302. (a) The National Science Foundation shall, through grants to or contracts with nonprofit professional scientific or engineering organizations, science museums, regional science education centers, public television, consortia of local educational agencies, intrastate resource and service centers, and institutions of higher education (including community colleges), conduct, assist, and foster research and experimentation on, and dissemination of, models of instruction in the operation and use of computers. Such models of instruction may include model training programs for adults. In carrying out the provisions of this section, the Foundation shall give priority to proposals prepared with active and broad community involvement of such groups as parents, teachers, school boards and administrators, and local business.

(b) Funds available under a grant or contract pursuant to this section may be used for the acquisition of computer hardware and software.

(c) The Director of the National Science Foundation shall report to the Congress annually on the results of research and experimentation performed with funds made available under this section. The Director, in conjunction with the National Institute of Education, shall take such steps as may be necessary to disseminate information concerning such results to local educational agencies.

(d) There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out this section such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year 1985 and for each succeeding fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1991.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE COMPUTER EDUCATION ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1984

The bill provides that it be cited as the "Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984."

Section 2. This section provides that the purpose of the Act is "to improve and strengthen computer education instruction in elementary and secondary schools and thereby to improve students' academic performance. . . ." Such improvement is to be achieved by encouraging planning for the use and application of computers in the instructional programs of elementary and secondary schools; by encouraging the acquisition of computer hardware in those schools with the greatest needs; by improving teacher training in computer education; and by assisting in the development and acquisition of computer software.

Section 3. This section provides definitions of terms, including "computer hardware" and "computer software."

TITLE I—ACQUISITION OF COMPUTER RESOURCES

Section 101. This section authorizes the Secretary of Education to provide Federal funding to States to help meet the costs of enhancing the computer education resources available in elementary and secondary schools. The authorized appropriation level for this title is $150 million for FY 1985 and for each suceeding fiscal year through FY 1988. Such sums as necessary are authorized for FY 1989 and each fiscal year through FY 1991.

Section 102. This section provides that of the sums appropriated for this title, 2 percent are to be reserved for payments to Puerto Rico and the outlying territories. The remainder of the appropriated amount is to be distributed by formula among the States plus the District of Columbia. Half of the remainder is to be distributed to each State in the same proportion as its share of total school-aged population (aged 5 to 17); half is to be distributed to each State in the same proportion as its allocation of funds under the Basic Grant program of chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981 (formerly, title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965) is of the total amount allocated as basic grants. The Act provides that the chapter 1 allotment formula used as a basis for distributing half of the remainder is to be modified somewhat from the actually used for chapter 1 allocation. The State educational agency (SEA) will in turn allocate these funds to local educational agencies (LEAs) within the State.

Section 103. This section describes the uses of these funds as meeting the Federal share of planning to facilitate the expansion of computer resources in schools; of acquiring computer hardware for use in schools; of conducting teacher training programs to improve the quality of computer education instruction; and of acquiring computer software.

Section 104. This section provides that, to receive funds, each State must file an application with the Secretary of Education. That application must designate the SEA as the agency responsible for administering and supervising these programs; assure that planning activities will be carried out by LEAs (using up to 10 percent of each local agency's allotment in FY 1985 and up to 5 percent for FY 1986); assure that the State will use these funds to supplement, not supplant, funds that would otherwise have been made available; assure that not more than 10 percent of the State's allotment will be used for administering this program; assure that the State, through the SEA or "intrastate resource and service centers," will provide services to local agencies; assure that the SEA will pay the non-Federal share of the cost of these programs from non-Federal sources; provides that notice and opportunity for hearing will be granted to each LEA prior to denying its application; and provides such additional assurance deemed necessary by the Secretary of Education. State applications will cover a period of not to exceed 7 years, may be amended annually, and will not be disapproved without notice and opportunity for hearing.

Section 105. This section provides that an LEA can receive funding if it files with the SEA an application that identifies the computer hardware, software and teacher or training programs in its schools; states the uses for which funds are requested; assures that at least half of its allotment will serve children served under chapter 1 allocations (primarily, children in poverty families); assures that the funds will be targetted to those schools with the greatest computer-related needs; assures that planning activities will be carried out (such as identifying the goals for computer education, setting instructional priorities for computer usage, establishing schedules for computer placement within schools, etc.); assures that these funds will supplement, not supplant, non-Federal funds otherwise available; assures that the LEA will pay the non-Federal share from non-Federal sources of funds; agrees to keep necessary records; and describes how the agency will ensure parental participation in its computer hardware acquisition program and curricular programs using such hardware. Applications will cover a period not to exceed 7 years, and may be amended annually.

Section 106. This section provides that children in private schools can participate under the same terms as they do in chapter 1.

Section 107. This section provides that the Secretary will make payments of the Federal share of the costs of these programs for each State's allotment. The Federal share is 75 percent. Non-Federal contributions to meet the non-Federal share may be made in cash or in kind.

TITLE II—TEACHER TRAINING INSTITUTES

Section 201. This section provides that, from funds appropriated under Section 203, the Natonal Science Foundation (NSF) is to enter into contracts or provide grants for the development and operation of institutions to improve the qualifications of individuals teaching the use of the computer in computer education or other elementary and secondary programs. Among the institutions eligible to contract with, or receive grants from, the NSF are nonprofit professional scientific organizations, science museums, consortia of LEAs, and institutions of higher education. The Foundation is to give special consideration to applicants who will train individuals for service in elementary and secondary schools enrolling substantial numbers of disadvantaged children, including those of limited English-proficiency.

Section 202. This section provides that individuals attending such institutes will be eligible to receive a stipend of $275 per week of attendance.

Section 203. This section authorizes the appropriation of $20 million for each fiscal year from FY 1985 through FY 1991.

TITLE III—INFORMATION DISSEMINATION AND EVALUATION

Section 301. This section provides that, in order to provide advice and technical assistance to State and local education agencies on the expenditure of funds provided under title I of the Act, the Secretary of Education (through the National Institute of Education) and the NSF are to evaluate available computer hardware and software; disseminate such evaluations; and develop model educational software. Such sums as may be necessary are authorized for FY 1985 through FY 1991.

Section 302. This section provides that the NSF, through grants or contracts with the same kinds of organizations specified in section 201, is to assist research on, and dissemination of, computer instruction models. Priority is to be given to proposals having the involvement of groups such as parents, teachers, school board, school administrators and local businesses. The Director of NSF is to report annually to the Congress on the results of activities supported under this section. Such sums as may be necessary are authorized to be appropriated for FY 1985 through FY 1991.

COMPUTER EDUCATION ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues today in introducing the Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984. This bill is a composite of what we consider the best features of several bills already introduced; and, as such, represents the most effective Federal response to the very critical needs our Nation's schools face in the area of computer education. I am indebted to Representative WIRTH of Colorado—who introduced a model bill in the House—to Senator LAUTENBERG, and to Senators DODD and KENNEDY, all of whom introduced key legislation here in the Senate. It is from these bills that our legislation today is drawn.

The March 19, 1984, Newsweek magazine, in an article assessing the computer phenomenon now taking place in our Nation's schools, observed that the use of computers "is not simply an educational innovation: their use is being forced on schools by society." Indeed, the President's National Commission on Excellence in Education, in its report last spring, clearly recognized this new educational requisite. It identified what it called the "five new basics" in secondary education. They are, according to the Commission, English, math, science, social studies, and computer science.

School administrators and school boards have been scrambling to try to meet this new demand. And, as can be expected, some key problems have emerged with which we need to be concerned. Our bill addresses these concerns.

The first and most critical problem directly relates to our historic Federal commitment to insuring access in education. It is the fact that access to this "computer revolution" is not equal among poor schools, poor children and rich schools, and rich children. A 1983 University of Minnesota study found that the 12,000 wealthiest schools in the country are four times more likely to have microcomputers than the 12,000 poorest. The Johns Hopkins Center for Social Organization of Schools has found that in 1983 nearly 70 percent of the schools in more affluent areas had at least one microcomputer, while only 40 percent of the schools in poorer areas had such equipment. There is clearly an equity problem in computer education opportunities and it stems from a very real disparity in the financial resource capabilities of schools.

In my own State of West Virginia, financial resources have been severely strained by the effects of the Reagan recession, slowing down the implementation of computer education. Nevertheless, West Virginia has embarked upon a very well designed and impressive statewide computer network to bring computer education capabilities to West Virginia schools. The program began this year, and will reach, by the end of the year, all of the 71 vocational schools and a dozen high schools in the State, providing computer access for high school seniors only. Obviously, many more resources will be needed before this outstanding program can reach all West Virginia schools and students in all grades.

West Virginia is embarking on this ambitious project in the face of very limited resources because the State understands that there is no choice if the State is to provide West Virginia students with the educational opportunities necessary in the 1980's. Dr. Ronald E. Anderson, one of the directors of the University of Minnesota study, has offered us an ominous warning. He states, in his report dated September 5, 1983, that—

> To check the growing disparity between the haves and the have nots, explicit educational computing policies need to be established and implemented at all levels. . . . The implications are not just ethical and social, but they are economic as well. If differential opportunities for computer literacy continue to grow, large segments of the labor force will be rendered increasingly less productive as a consequence of not being able to function effectively and comfortably with the computers around them.

Our bill today is an effort to insure access, by targeting Federal money to these schools and students who need it most.

After access, the second most critical problem to arise out of this computer revolution is the probability that schools will be stuck with useless and inappropriate systems if they do not engage in thorough planning before they buy or accept as donations, hardware and software packages. Mr. President, I am reminded of the old adage "haste makes waste." It is certainly true in the field of computers.

Education officials have told me horror stories of schools rushing to purchase equipment before undertaking any sort of planning as to how the equipment will be used, by whom, for what, and toward what goals. This is also often the case when schools accept donations from computer manufacturers.

Planning is critical. Officials from the Department of Education of the State of West Virginia share this belief. Before spending a penny on the purchase of hardware or software, West Virginia officials undertook a very thorough planning process that looked at every conceivable factor in the design, purchase, maintenance, and present and future applications of a computer system. Heavy emphasis was put on curriculum planning. This is the kind of planning all schools should undertake. Mr. Henry Jay Becker, director of the Johns Hopkins University study—the most comprehensive study to date of school computer use—is quoted in the Newsweek article as saying that he has found "(t)here is an overenthusiasm about the idea of computers and an underenthusiasm about changing the curriculum in ways more suitable for their use." It is our hope that our bill will help to change this situation by putting heavy emphasis on planning in the bill. Local educational agencies, before receiving grants under the bill, are required to have on file in the State educational agency an application which provides assurances that the local agency will undertake planning in a number of specific areas that we have outlined in the bill. Additionally, because we know that there are economies of scale in terms of purchase and maintenance agreements and because it will enhance educational capabilities if school systems are able to talk with each other, we encourage local educational agencies to develop joint computer systems.

A third problem in computer education today is a shortage of adequate teacher training programs. Our bill addresses this problem by setting up a grant program, to be administered by the National Science Foundation, available to a wide variety of local, State, or regional agencies—including museums, community colleges, nonprofit scientific or engineering organizations, et cetera, for the development and operation of teacher training institutes.

A fourth and final problem our bill addresses is one that has received, perhaps, more recognition in the trade magazines and in educational circles than any other I have mentioned today, and that is the inadequate state of software developed for use in elementary and secondary schools. This situation has been described as a catch-22 because computer software manufacturers apparently do not want to commit many resources to this type of development until there are enough machines in elementary and secondary schools to make it a profitable enterprise. Schools, on the other hand, are hardpressed to find suitable software at prices they can afford in the quantities that are needed to supply multiple terminals. Therefore, we have included a separate title in our bill directed to the Department of Education and the National Science Foundation specifically for the development of model computer software and the development and dissemination of model computer education programs.

In closing, Mr. President, I would like to reiterate that we believe our bill, the Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984, is the proper Federal response to the computer education needs of America's schools. I would like to add that it is, at this time of record deficits, a necessarily small response—we are proposing an authorization of only $170 million for the planning, acquisition, and teacher training institutes portion of the bill and such sums for the research portions. And, finally, I would like to point out that this bill, in structure, is fully complementary with and would augment the math-science bill that I hope we will soon pass here in the Senate.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, today Senators BYRD, LAUTENBERG, MOYNIHAN, KENNEDY, and I are introducing the Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984.

This proposed legislation is a collaborative effort which combines many important components of S. 1849 and S. 1869, two bills supporting computer education, introduced last session by Senator LAUTENBERG and myself respectively.

The legislation is premised on the belief that the Federal Government has an appropriate and important role in initiating, supporting, and equalizing access to quality computer education programs for America's students.

Quality computer education programs, properly integrated into existing curricula, should compliment and enhance traditional school subjects. They need not, and must not, be imposed upon existing curricula at the expense of such basics as English, writing, science, or mathematics. The proper inclusion of computers as a tool of education, however, should assist students in acquiring specific skills needed in today's high-tech informational society.

John Nesbitt wrote in his book "Megatrends:" "Schools around the Nation are beginning to realize that in the information society, the two required languages will be English and computer."

Although no one can safely predict the full impact of this technological revolution on the Nation's education systems, some problems are already clearly identifiable.

For example, many students in the more affluent schools effectively are being taught to utilize computers as a part of routine classwork. On the other hand, many students in less affluent or less progressive schools are being frustrated by the lack of computer access and computer-literate teachers. This division in educational opportunities may ultimately create a technological caste system within the Nation's schools which we can ill-afford.

Many of the more affluent and progressive schools, nonetheless, have problems other than providing computer access to students. For example, there is little national data about the kind, number, and effectiveness of computer hardware and software currently available to education leaders. It is not surprising, then, that many school officials have not been effective in choosing the hardware and software most suitable for their schools' needs.

The legislation we are introducing can be an important first step in providing solutions to some of the problems of access and equity in quality computer education.

For example, the Computer Education Assistance Act of 1984 provides for the allocation of funds for the purchase of computer hardware, priority being given to schools with the greatest need; establishment of teacher training institutes. It also authorizes new appropriations for the National Science Foundation and the National Institute of Education to research, evaluate, and disseminate information regarding available computer hardware and software. In addition, this legislation includes provisions for the development of "appropriate" computer education programs for use in the classroom.

Funds under this act would be allocated to States half on the basis of school age population and half on the basis of chapter 1 formula as outlined in the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981.

In addition, funds are to be provided on a matching basis, the Federal share being 75 percent and the non-Federal being 25 percent—in cash or in kind.

This legislation, in my judgment, will strengthen and improve existing education programs and assist students in acquiring those skills relevant to the needs of today's high-tech information society. In addition, it would help insure equal access for all students to these programs.

Mr. President, the Congress can make a valuable contribution to the Nation's future by providing support for quality computer education programs. I ask my colleagues' support for this important legislation.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleagues, Senator LAUTENBERG and Senator DODD in introducing legislation to improve and expand computer education in America's elementary and secondary schools.

Of late, a number of important studies have concluded that the American educational system is not equipping our children with the skills necessary for a rapidly changing world. Perhaps the most important of these changes is the increasingly routine use of computers, which are revolutionizing communications and threatening to render functionally illiterate those who do not possess a modicum of computer proficiency. As was noted in the report by the National Commission on Excellence in Education, "A Nation at Risk": "Computers and computer-controlled equipment are penetrating every aspect of our lives—homes, factories, and offices."

This legislation would meet this reality by providing $150 million annually for fiscal years 1985 through 1988, to assist State and local educational agencies in developing programs of computer instruction. The funding would be directed to three areas: the purchase of computer hardware and software; improvements in teacher training; and development of curricula for instruction in computer skills and the use of computers in other academic fields.

The development of computer curricula is an important and appealing aspect of this legislation. An expensive investment in equipment and software would be of little use without programs of instruction. I also would emphasize that this bill addresses one of the major problems plaguing American education—insufficient teacher training. Instructors as well as students would benefit from the provision for computer training.

I would urge all of my colleagues to support this vital educational measure. Computers will play an increasingly important role in our lives. This legislation recognizes and addresses the need for our educational system to improve computer training.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 875

At the request of Mr. MATHIAS, the name of the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. LAUTENBERG) was added as a cosponsor of S. 875, a bill to amend title 18 of the United States Code to strengthen the laws against the counterfeiting of trademarks, and for other purposes.

S. 1069

At the request of Mr. CHAFEE, the name of the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1069, a bill to amend the Federal power Act to limit the recovery by public utilities of certain costs of construction work in progress through rate increases.

S. 1201

At the request of Mr. MATHIAS, the name of the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1201, a bill to amend title 17 of the United States Code to protect semiconductor chips and masks against unauthorized duplication, and for other purposes.

S. 1262

At the request of Mr. GRASSLEY, the name of the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HUMPHREY) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1262, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to improve Internal Revenue Service procedures concerning investigations and audits of churches, and for other purposes.

S. 1504

At the request of Mr. BENTSEN, the name of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1504, a bill to provide for protection of historic shipwrecks, structures, and artifacts located on a seabed or in the subsoil of the lands beneath waters of the United States.

S. 1839

At the request of Mr. GRASSLEY, the name of the Senator from Alabama (Mr. HEFLIN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1839, a bill to provide for an equitable reduction of liability of contractors with the United States in certain cases, to provide a comprehensive system for indemnification by the United States of its contractors for liability in excess of reasonably available financial protection, and for other purposes.

S. 1925

At the request of Mr. BYRD, the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEINZ) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1925, a bill to establish a national coal science, technology, and engineering development program.

S. 1938

At the request of Mr. HATCH, the names of the Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) were added as cosponsors of S. 1938, a bill to amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, the Federal Meat Inspection Act, the Poultry Products Inspection Act, and the Egg Products Inspection Act, and for other purposes.

S. 2030

At the request of Mr. SYMMS, his name was added as a cosponsor of S. 2030, a bill to repeal the War Powers Resolution.

S. 2048

At the request of Mr. HATCH, the name of the Senator from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2048, a bill to provide for the establishment of a task force in organ procurement and transplantation and an organ procurement and transplantation registry, and for other purposes.

S. 2117

At the request of Mrs. HAWKINS, the name of the Senator from Washington (Mr. GORTON) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2117, a bill entitled the "National Childhood Vaccine Injury Compensation Act."

S. 2165

At the request of Mr. DANFORTH, the name of the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BOREN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2165, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to increase research activities, to foster university research and scientific training, and to encourage the contribution of scientific equipment to institutions of higher education.

S. 2266

At the request of Mr. CRANSTON, the names of the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) and the Senator from Virginia (Mr. WARNER) were added as cosponsors of S. 2266, a bill to grant a Federal charter to Vietnam Veterans of America, Inc.

S. 2281

At the request of Mr. HATCH, the name of the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2281, a bill to revise and extend provisions of the Public Health Service Act relating to the National Health Service Corps.

S. 2295

At the request of Mr. QUAYLE, the name of the Senator from Michigan (Mr. LEVIN) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2295, a bill to amend title 23, United States Code, to provide that for purposes of determining the minimum allocation paid to any State, the amount of taxes treated as paid into the highway trust fund with respect to gasohol and certain methanol and ethanol fuels shall be determined as if such fuels were taxes as gasoline.

S. 2303

At the request of Mr. HATCH, the name of the Senator from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2303, a bill to revise and extend the alcohol and drug abuse and mental health services block grant.

S. 2378

At the request of Mr. ABDNOR, the names of the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), the Senator from Utah (Mr. GARN), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) were added as a cosponsors of S. 2378, a bill to provide authorizations of appropriations for the impact aid program under Public Law 874 of the 81st Congress, and for other purposes.

S. 2460

At the request of Mr. MITCHELL, the names of the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABDNOR), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ), and the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE) were added as a cosponsor of S. 2460, a bill to designate a Federal building in Augusta, Maine, as the "Edmund S. Muskie Federal Building."

S. 2461

At the request of Mr. MITCHELL, the names of the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER), the Senator from Idaho (Mr. SYMMS), the Senator from Florida (Mrs. HAWKINS), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABDNOR), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), and the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE) were added as cosponsors of S. 2461, a bill to designate a Federal building in Bangor, Maine, as the "Margaret Chase Smith Federal Building."

S. 2516

At the request of Mr. ABDNOR, the name of the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2516, a bill to provide for a graduated reduction of the budget deficit of the Federal Government.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 129

At the request of Mr. PRESSLER, the name of the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 129, a joint resolution calling upon the President to seek a mutual and verifiable ban on weapons in space and on weapons designed to attack objects in space.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 165

At the request of Mr. MATHIAS, the name of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 165, a joint resolution to commemorate the bicentennial anniversary of the constitutional foundation for patent and copyright laws.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 224

At the request of Mr. BOREN, the name of the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 224, a joint resolution to designate the week of April 1, 1984, as "National Amateur Wrestling Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 244

At the request of Mr. DOLE, the names of the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. COCHRAN), the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. NICKLES), and the Senator from California (Mr. WILSON) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 244, a joint resolution designating the week beginning on May 6, 1984, as "National Asthma and Allergy Awareness Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 246

At the request of Mr. EXON, the name of the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BOREN) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Joint Resolution 246, a joint resolution strongly urging the President to secure a full accounting of Americans captured or missing in action in Southeast Asia, and for other purposes.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 257

At the request of Mr. STEVENS, the names of the Senator from Maine (Mr. COHEN) and the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 257, a joint resolution to designate the period July 1, 1984, through July 1, 1985, as the "Year of the Ocean."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 258

At the request of Mr. BIDEN, the names of the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. DURENBERGER), the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS), and the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 258, a joint resolution to designate the week of June 24 through June 30, 1984 as "National Safety in the Workplace Week."

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 267

At the request of Mr. CHILES, the names of the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK), the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. MATTINGLY), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) were added as cosponsors of Senate Joint Resolution 267, a joint resolution to designate the week of September 23, 1984, through September 29, 1984, as "National Drug Abuse Education and Prevention Week."

SENATE RESOLUTION 306

At the request of Mr. ANDREWS, the name of the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 306, a resolution to preserve the food stamp program and other food assistance programs.

AMENDMENT NO. 2886

At the request of Mr. BUMPERS, the names of the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR) and the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. BOSCHWITZ) were added as cosponsors of amendment No. 2886 proposed to House Joint Resolution 492, a joint resolution making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, for the Department of Agriculture.

At the request of Mr. BOREN, his name was added as a cosponsor of amendment No. 2886 proposed to House Joint Resolution 492, supra.

At the request of Mr. CHAFEE, his name was added as a cosponsor of amendment No. 2886 proposed to House Joint Resolution 492, supra.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION

BUMPERS (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2886

Mr. BUMPERS (for himself, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SASSER, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. EXON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. DIXON, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. CHAFEE, and Mr. BOREN) proposed an amendment (which was subsequently modified) to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, for the Department of Agriculture; as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, add the following new section:

"SEC. . If at any time following the appropriation of funds herein the duly elected President of El Salvador should be prevented from taking office by military force or military decree or after taking office shall be deposed by military force or military decree, all funds appropriated herein for El Salvador and not theretofore obligated or expended shall not thereafter be available for obligation or expenditure unless reappropriated by Congress."

LEAHY (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2887

Mr. LEAHY (for himself, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. BYRD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. DODD, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. PELL, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. BINGAMAN, and Mr. SASSER) proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492), supra; as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following:

"PROHIBITION ON THE INTRODUCTION OF UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES INTO OR OVER EL SALVADOR FOR COMBAT

"(a) United States Armed Forces shall not be introduced into or over El Salvador for combat purposes unless—

"(1) the Congress has declared war or enacted specific authorization for such use of United States Armed Forces; or

"(2) such introduction of United States Armed Forces is necessary—

"(A) to meet a clear and present danger of hostile attack upon the United States; or

"(B) to meet a clear and present danger to, and to provide essential and immediate evacuation of, citizens of the United States.

"(b) If the United States Armed Forces are introduced into El Salvador pursuant to clause (A) or (B) of subsection (a)(2), the President shall describe such grounds in the report required by section 4(a) of The War Powers Resolution (Public Law 93-148).

"(c) For the purposes of section (a) the introduction of United States Armed Forces into or over El Salvador for combat purposes shall be defined as the introduction of United States Armed Forces for the purpose of delivering weapons fire upon an enemy.

"(d)(1) Any joint resolution or bill introduced at the request of the President pursuant to subsection (a)(1) shall become the pending business of the House in which it was introduced and shall be voted on within three calendar days thereafter, unless such House shall otherwise determine by yeas and nays.

"(2) Such a joint resolution or bill passed by one House shall become the pending business of the other House and shall be voted on within three calendar days after it has been received, unless such House shall otherwise determine by yeas or nays.

"(3) In the case of any disagreement between the two Houses of Congress with respect to a joint resolution or bill passed by both Houses, conferees shall be promptly appointed and the committee of conference shall make and file a report with respect to such resolution or bill not later than two calendar days after the appointment of the committee of conference. In the event the conferees are unable to agree within 48 hours, they shall report back to their respective Houses in disagreement. Notwithstanding any rule in either House concerning the printing of conference reports in the RECORD or concerning any delay in the consideration of such reports, such report shall be acted on by both Houses not later than one calendar day after the conferees report back to their respective Houses."

DODD AMENDMENT NO. 2888

Mr. DODD proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492), supra; as follows:

On page 5, line 2 strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated under this heading may be made available, directly or indirectly, for planning, directing, executing, or supporting acts of terrorism in, over, or offshore from the territory of Nicaragua.".

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO MEET

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate at 10 a.m., on Wednesday, April 4, to hold a hearing on Senate Resolution 329, nuclear risk reduction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, April 4, at 2 p.m., to hold a hearing on proposed U.N. Convention on Contracts for the International Sale of Goods.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, April 4, to hold a hearing on child nutrition programs, concentrating on those programs, except for WIC, that expire at the end of the present fiscal year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON INFORMATION MANAGEMENT AND REGULATORY AFFAIRS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Information Management and Regulatory Affairs of the Committee on Governmental Affairs be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, April 4, to hold a hearing on S. 2433, Reauthorization of the Paperwork Reduction Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON LABOR

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Labor, of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources, be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, April 4, at 2 p.m., to hold a hearing to receive testimony on S. 2435, the termination of overfunded defined benefit pension plans and reversion of assets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

ADULT DAY CARE

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I would like to take a few moments to share with my colleagues some information about adult day care services and to encourage your support for Senate Joint Resolution 269, designating the week of September 23, 1984 as "National Adult Day Care Center Week."

Adult day care programs have grown substantially in the past 10 years. According to a study completed by the Hospital Research and Education Trust, there are now over 800 adult day care centers. These programs, funded through title XX and in select instances, medicaid, and through private funds, provide a supportive environment for individuals who cannot remain at home. For some, adult day care services offer an option to institutionalization, particularly when the primary caregiver is employed out of the home.

Maintenance and rehabilitation services are available at most adult day care centers. Center staff members provide protection for those who require regular supervision. They encourage social companionship, see that the participants have nutritious and balanced meals, and they perform health and mental health screening services.

As a member of the Senate Aging Committee, I chaired a hearing on alternatives to institutionalization in my home State of Ohio. Many speakers reinforced my support for day care services through the personal experiences they described. I commend the thousands of individuals who have developed these important services. I hope you will join me in acknowledging support for their efforts through your sponsorship of this resolution.●

EDUCATING FOR EXCELLENCE

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the students and faculty in the School of Education at the University of North Carolina at Wilmington heard a remarkable address by Dr. Donald J. Senese on the subject, "Educating for Excellence."

Dr. Senese is Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement, Department of Education. In this capacity he is leading the implementation of Secretary Bell's initiatives in the area of instructional technology. Dr. Senese's office conducts programs that provide collection of data on education, Federal funding for research projects, professional development programs, funding for libraries, and support for educational technologies. All these areas are instrumental in providing a well-rounded base for education.

Mr. President, I commend Dr. Senese's address to the consideration of Senators, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The address follows:

EDUCATING FOR EXCELLENCE

(By Dr. Donald J. Senese)

Good Morning, it is indeed a great pleasure to be here this morning on the beautiful campus of the University of North Carolina at Wilmington to address a topic of growing interest and concern in the field of education—the significance of the technology revolution for education.

Until recently, it has been for the most part educators—classroom teachers, school administrators, college and university professors responsible for teacher training, and sometimes a few parents of students in the schools—who have been concerned with education. Today, we find that situation changing and changing rapidly. Education is becoming a matter of interest to everyone; it is an issue of vital concern to all Americans. A Gallup poll in June of this year revealed that education ranks second only to unemployment as the most important issue of the 1984 campaign.

There are several reasons why education has come to the forefront of public attention.

One of the factors involved in elevating education as a prime issue of national concern is the very obvious movement of not only the United States but the world into an "Information Age". Inspired by the new technologies, there is a premium on rapidly gathering and disseminating all types of information. Where once the people of the world suffered from a limited amount of information, we are now in a period of abundant information where we must carefully select what is relevant and what is not relevant to our daily lives.

These new technologies are having a major impact on what we teach in our schools and the way we teach it. There remains many and varied opinions about the role of education and the educator in the information age with some educators viewing technology as a utopia to solve all or most of our educational problems and others viewing items such as computers in the schools as the next crisis in education.

More and more educators are beginning to recognize the great potential of technology to enhance learning of students, increase teacher productivity, and produce more effective schools. Cognizant of the current national debate over "master teachers" and merit pay at the elementary and secondary level, there is a growing focus being placed on the outcome of our educational system. Simply stated, the question is being raised, 'What can we do so that teachers, students and schools can perform better?

How we approach the educational challenges which face us today will determine, in a very real sense, the quality of life and the ability to be productive citizens for those students now in school as well as those who will follow. It will perhaps even determine the ability of our nation to survive.

Another major factor in elevating education as a prominent issue has been the release of the report by the National Commission on Excellence in Education. The Commission was appointed by U.S. Secretary of Education, Terrel H. Bell. The job of the Commission was to review and report on the status of education across the nation.

The report which came out was like a firebell in the night—awakening our generation to a sudden and real danger. The Commission members, representing a wide variety of backgrounds and philosophical viewpoints, issued a unanimous report. They found an educational system in deep trouble. We were schooling many but really educating few. The sense of seriousness, alarm, and concern was reflected in the very title of the report, "A Nation At Risk: The Imperative for Educational Reform."

Allow me to read some of the more alarming comments from the beginning of the report:

"Our nation is at risk. Our once unchallenged preeminence in commerce, industry, science and technological innovation is being overtaken by competitors throughout the world. * * * the educational foundations of our society are presently being eroded by a rising tide of mediocrity that threatens our very future as a Nation and a people. What was unimaginable a generation ago has begun to occur—others are matching and surpassing our educational attainments. * * * We have, in effect, been committing an act of unthinking, unilateral educational disarmament.

Our first reaction as educators might be to go on the defensive. We can deny the conclusions, blame others for this situation, or make excuses. First of all, the report presents compelling evidence for its conclusions and it is extremely difficult for any fair minded individual to deny American education is in a crisis situation. Second, we can blame others and I am sure we would all have our favorite targets; I am also convinced that there is plenty of blame to go all around. And finally, we can always plead exceptional circumstances—we are educating more children now in our system than in previous years, we are giving greater opportunities for less favored groups in our population, and we are offering a greater variety of choice to students.

These excuses ring hollow as we examine the need to give all children a quality education. Excellence and equity need to go hand-in-hand, not as separate or adverse goals. How do we benefit the poor and minorities by giving them a substandard education in the name of equity and fairness? Anything worth doing is worth doing well and our educational system must perform better for all students.

Too often we have seen our educational system deteriorate from teaching the three R's (reading, 'riting, and 'rithmetic) to teaching the six R's—remedial reading, remedial 'riting, and remedial 'rithmetic. Is it not amazing that we have so much time to devote to these remedial activities and not enough time to teach them correctly in the first place?

The findings of the Commission were hardly a surprise to educators who have perceived these trends over the past few years. The same alarming trends were confirmed by other reports which were issued subsequently: The "Action for Excellence" report of the Task Force on Education for Economic Growth by the Education Commission of the States, the "Report of the Twentieth Century Fund Task Force on Federal Elementary and Secondary Education Policy," and "America's Competitive Challenge: The Need for A National Response," of the Business-Higher Education Forum.

These reports issue a clarion call to all of us to assess where we have been in education, where we are presently, and where we should be going. We realize that education is costly but ignorance is even more costly for a nation. We need to realize that money alone cannot resolve the problem. We are already spending a total of $215 billion per year on education, public and private. In fact, an excessive infusion of money could do more harm if it merely allows us to make the same mistakes with more resources. We not only need to do things better but we must do things differently.

I would like to identify a few of the problems.

Signs of a decline have been evident over the past decade or two. For example, we have witnessed a steady decline in the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) scores of students. Although last year's scores showed a slight increase for the first time in many years, it is too soon to tell whether or not that upturn indicates a reversal in trend or a fluke.

We have seen a growing number of students, completing not only elementary and secondary schools but college as well, who cannot properly read and write. We find industries having to spend valuable resources to improve skills of workers which should have been developed in our nation's schools. One of our recently discovered problems is adult illiteracy. These millions of adult illiterates we have discovered are products of our schools.

We have seen students taking easy courses—sometimes referred to as "lifestyle courses"—in place of rigorous academic studies. These courses neither challenge them intellectually nor prepare them for the increasingly complex, technological world.

We have seen grades inflated at the same time as courses have been deflated in content. We have witnessed the superfluous replacing the substantial in our school curriculum. Are we really gaining anything when courses such as "bachelor living," "consumer math" and "problems of democracy" have replaced English, geometry, and history as essentials in our schools? We have offered our students in the name of democratic education a cafeteria approach in education where the choices are heavily weighed in favor of desserts and tilted against the more nutritious foods, the meats and potatoes. "A mind is a terrible thing to waste!"

You are all involved in education. You know that some things are right with American education and some things need improving. The report by the National Commission on Excellence in Education provides an impetus for not only those who have careers in education but the public at large to focus on improving education.

I mentioned earlier that two factors which had put education into the forefront of national attention has been the potential of new technologies in our world and their use for education and the report of the National Commission on Excellence in Education. Another very important factor has been Presidential leadership.

President Reagan is the first president for a quarter of a century to put education back on the national agenda. What other President in our memory through his speeches and visits to diverse school settings throughout the country has focused on the serious consequences of a deterioration in our public education system? This task calls for an educational renewal and more money alone won't solve the problem. In his address to the graduates of Seton Hall University in May of this year, the President stated his commitment to educational renewal in these terms—

"The road to better education for all our people simply cannot be paved with more and more recycled tax dollars collected, redistributed, and overregulated by Washington bureaucrats. But there is much the federal government can do to help set a national agenda for excellence in education, a commitment to quality that can open up new opportunities and new horizons for our young people."

The Reagan Administration has a positive view of our educational system. The federal role in leadership in education is an important role but it is nonetheless a limited one. There are no plans to return to the type of programs offered in the 1960's in which large sums of federal monies were spent on a wide range of educational projects, some of little value. An excessive amount of federal aid could have a negative effect. We do not intend to provide an opportunity for computer companies to unload unneeded and outdated hardware on school systems or to get into controversial areas such as curriculum development, which may not meet the needs of schools throughout the country. In fact, a Federal aid program might at this stage cause overinvestment and excessive development in certain fields.

We are not only entering a new age in technology but a new age in educational responsibility and decision-making. The Reagan Administration, particularly through the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act (ECIA) or block grant approach, has been turning decision-making authority and finances back to the States and local school authorities. The purpose has been to reduce federal control while enhancing the decision-making process at the State and local level. We have been particularly pleased to note that the school districts have taken the opportunity to spend block grant money on acquisition of technology.

The Reagan Administration is trying to stimulate an atmosphere which encourages schools to get involved with instructional technology, to share information on technology, and to get the private sector more involved in instructional technology. We have been particularly pleased with outstanding examples throughout the country of business-school partnerships designed to improve education.

We have witnessed computer companies donating quality educational software to schools, providing free training courses for teachers on computers, working with schools in job training programs with the new technology and donating equipment to schools while other companies have worked to strengthen community support for the schools, assisted in training employees to take an interest in their local school board, and provide employees to assist schools with services ranging from teaching to career counseling to job training.

All of us are experiencing a period of limited resources. Business partnerships can assist us to make up that gap. A hard look at priorities in local budgets may require us to shift resources from other projects to our schools. Technology does offer us the opportunity to utilize cost savings with better equipment to improve education. We must not treat it as a fad or game but as a tool tied to quality and excellence in education.

In that same Seton Hall University speech, President Reagan described this Information Age as the beginning of another revolution—

". . . a revolution ranging from tiny microchips to voyages into the infinity of space; from information retrieval systems that can bring all of the great literature and films and music within reach of a family video unit, to new methods of health care and healing that will add years of full active existence to your life spans".

We in education face a great challenge and none greater than those of us in the field of technology. We are on the cutting edge of a revolution which will change every aspect of society. Time magazine named the computer as its "Man of the Year". Newsweek magazine featured a story recently on the race between the United States and Japan to build a supercomputer. More and more articles are focusing on the Fifth Generation and artificial intelligence.

John Nesbitt, author of "Megatrends: Ten New Directions Transforming Our Lives" notes:

"As we move from an industrial to an information society, we will use our brain power to create instead of our physical power, and the technology of the day will extend and enhance our mental ability."

All of you have the opportunity to play a key role in that change as we go about improving education. In that last line of Nesbitt's book he makes the comment:

My God, what a fantastic time to be Alive!

Well, it is! I wish you the best of luck in making the best of this fantastic time.●

KALAMAZOO CELEBRATES 100 YEARS

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise to congratulate the city of Kalamazoo as it celebrates its 100th anniversary on April 14.

Named after the Kalamazoo River, which started appearing in atlases as early as 1835, Kalamazoo is probably a Potowatomie Indian word which means something like boiling water, boiling pot, or place where the pot boils. Whether the name refers to the bubbling eddies on the river, to the cooking methods of the Indians, or to an Indian's race to the river and back before water boiled away in a pot is a continuing debate.

From the surrounding hills, many Indian trails converged on the only Kalamazoo River ford for many miles, and through the years various Indian camps were located near it. It was not until 1829 that Titus Bronson surveyed the area from an Indian mound, and decided that this was the place for a home. First called Bronson, the name was later changed to Kalamazoo. When a local land office opened in 1834, eager settlers from all parts of the country and Europe fast swelled the population.

Because it is halfway between Detroit and Chicago, Kalamazoo was a natural transportation hub. With the advantage of its waterpower, Kalamazoo soon became a diversified industrial center. Early products were horse carts and buggies, then steam engines, then even cars. The Kalamazoo Stove Co. marketed its products worldwide under the slogan "Kalamazoo Direct to You." Papermaking has long been a major industry with the first mill opening in 1866. Many well-known companies originated here; Shakespeare Co.—fishing tackle, Gibson Co.—guitars, Checker Motor Corp.—taxicabs, Upjohn Drug Co., one of the world's leading pharmaceutical firms. Even cigar making flourished in the last half of the 19th century. Rich farmland contributed to the diversity. Celery, primarily grown by the Dutch inhabitants on the rich muck lands in and around the city, made Kalamazoo the Nation's celery capital in the 1920's. In the 1970's Kalamazoo became the leading commercial source of bedded plants such as pansies, petunias, and marigolds. Earlier, other nearby muck land was the source of 90 percent of the world's supply of peppermint, refined by Kalamazoo's A. M. Todd Co. Farming needs led to the manufacture of harrows, plows, windmills. Clearly, this diversification helps to protect Kalamazoo in economic downturns.

From its earliest days, Kalamazoo has had a tradition of educational and cultural concern. Higher education received an early start when Kalamazoo College was chartered in 1833. It was coeducational long before most other higher education institutions. In addition, Kalamazoo, had the Nation's first tax-supported high school, the first building built for a women's club and the second public library children's room in Michigan. Today, its schools, four colleges, symphony orchestra, civic theater, art center, and library/museum support education, theatrical and artistic endeavors.

Through the years, Kalamazoo has earned a national reputation as a progressive community. The thriving village of Kalamazoo was chartered by the State to become a city in 1883 and on April 14, 1884, held its first city council meeting.

The first 100 years have been filled with tremendous growth and change for Kalamazoo. Through it all, the city has retained its unique character and community spirit. I know that all of us join the citizens of Kalamazoo in this celebration and eagerly look forward to the next 100 years.●

50TH ANNIVERSARY OF OHIO CREDIT UNION LEAGUE

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am pleased to have this opportunity to congratulate the Ohio Credit Union League on its 50th anniversary. The Ohio credit union law was enacted on August 31, 1931, and the Ohio Credit Union League's first organizational meeting was held on September 29, 1934. During this half century of service, the league has demonstrated that people can help each other through cooperative efforts to provide an effective means for saving, a source of credit and other financial services to citizens from all walks of life.

The Ohio Credit Union League through its statewide network of member credit unions has been encouraging individual responsibility and economic self reliance to membership that now totals over 2 million. The credit union movement provides communities with a resource for local investments and the circulation of capital. In this way the local, regional, State, and national economies are benefited. The financial progress of the Ohio Credit Union League, with aggregated credit union assets totaling over $3 billion is also a testament to the soundness of these principles.

The Ohio Credit Union will be celebrating its golden anniversary at its 50th annual meeting at the Hyatt Regency in Columbus from April 26 to 29. It is an honor to be part of the official salute to the 50 years of service by the Ohio Credit Union League.●

DEFICITS: RECORD IN THE RED

(By request of Mr. BYRD, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, 1984 was supposed to be the year of the long-awaited balanced budget. The President, in his state of the Union message, called for a commonsense approach to budgeting which avoids spending more than we take in. However, the President's budget plan for fiscal year 1985 and his long-term budget blueprint paint an economic picture for the next 5 years that is frightening indeed.

The President's fiscal year 1985 budget calls for outlays of $925.5 billion—an increase of 8.4 percent over spending levels for the current fiscal year. The President's budget assumes that the budget deficit next year will be $180.4 billion under rather optimistic economic growth assumptions. The President's budget plan assumes also that the deficit will shrink to $123 billion by fiscal year 1989.

However, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office (CBO) projects that the budget deficit for next year will grow to $197 billion and increase to $308 billion by 1989 unless drastic steps are taken by both the President and the Congress to attack the root causes of large deficits. And CBO estimates that if we continue on our present course, between this year and 1989, over $1.3 trillion in public debt will accumulate, forcing the American taxpayer to pay more and more for interest and less and less for defense and other vital services. Clearly, we can no longer stay the course.

Who is to blame for these large deficits? Is is President Reagan? Is it the Congress? Perhaps the answer is both. Let us look at the facts.

Since President Reagan came into office with a commitment to balance the budget by 1984, the country's red ink has more than tripled—from $57.9 billion in 1981 to the President's current estimate of $180.4 billion in 1985. What caused this huge deficit increase over the past 4 years? Most economists attribute the deficit boom to three major factors: First, the large defense budget buildup; second, the large tax reduction package of the President; and third, the increase in interest payments needed to pay for the money borrowed by Uncle Sam to cover the cost of our defense buildup and skyrocketing debt. This massive infusion of new debt also triggered a serious economic recession. The five highest budget deficits since 1943 will occur during the Reagan administration if he continues his present policies, and the first 4 years of the Reagan administration will accumulate larger budget deficits and national debt than any other previous 4-year period in American history.

But what about the Congress? Could not they put a stop to these policies that have contributed to our growing national debt? The answer is yes, and to a large extent the Congress has put the brakes on spending. For example, contrary to public opinion, Congress has reduced nondefense domestic spending programs by $76 billion over the past 3 years. On the other hand, the Congress must accept a portion of the blame for approving most of the large defense spending increases and tax cuts that the President requested during his first term in office. Congress must also accept a portion of the blame for not tackling the tough problem of bringing entitlement spending programs under control. And, although domestic spending programs have been sharply cut by the Congress since 1981, I firmly believe that there is still considerable room for additional spending cuts in the so-called nondefense, discretionary side of the budget, and in the defense budget itself.

What does all of this mean to the average Arizonan? One might ask, "If inflation is down to 3.2 percent; if unemployment is down to nearly 8 percent; and the economic industrial giants, such as General Motors, Sears and others are doing so well, why all this doom and gloom about the future?" There are really three major threats that another 4 years of $200 billion deficits pose to the country. First, the accumulation of red ink means that a larger fraction of taxpayer dollars will be used to pay interest on our $1.3 trillion debt, rather than to purchase essential services, or be available for investment by the private sector. Interest on the debt was holding firm at about 7 percent of gross outlays in the 1970's. Now it has reached 10.7 percent, and the Congressional Budget Office projects it will reach a staggering 15.6 percent by 1989. This means that the average Arizona taxpayer will be paying more and more to pay off interest, and less and less for more defense security, education, or health care services.

Second, as Government borrows more and more to finance this snowballing debt, it will be taking more and more capital out of the private sector—capital that is used to finance home building, car manufacturing, and schools. If you have less money to borrow to buy houses and cars, you pay more as interest rates increase steadily. The result? Capital expansion will be slowed or halted in those private sectors of the economy that rely on financing. This means that the average Arizona taxpayer will pay more for a home mortgage, more to finance a car and more for State and local capital projects, such as schools and highways.

Third, continuing high deficits can make the conduct of trade policy more difficult and expensive for the United States. As real interest rates increase, American businesses attempting to compete with foreign imports will suffer substantially. The cost of U.S. goods abroad will increase, our export industries and products facing import competition will all suffer, and our trade imbalance will increase. This means that the average Arizona taxpayer will have to rely more and more on imported goods, and foreign markets for U.S.-made goods will decline.

Frankly, I do not believe that the President has attacked the seriousness of our deficit problem head-on. Nothing has higher priority than starting to reduce the budget deficit now.

I am proposing a five-point, deficit-reducing package which I believe would make a good start toward cutting the size of the deficit while at the same time sharing the burden among all segments of the economy.

First, rescind the third year of the tax cut. The revenue base of the Government must be restored. This action would reduce the deficit by approximately $89 billion over 3 years if adopted by April 1984, including $35 billion in fiscal year 1985 alone. We should use these savings to reduce the deficit—not to pay more interest on the national debt or for more big spending programs. Furthermore, every taxpayer would still be receiving the benefits of the first tier of the President's 15 percent tax cut adopted in 1982—the largest peacetime tax cut in history.

Second, cut all discretionary, nonentitlement programs, including the legislative branch, the Executive Office of the President, and defense by 3 percent. These programs are directly under the control of the spending committees in the Congress. This would result in a savings of $14.3 billion in fiscal year 1985.

Third, although the Grace Commission and I disagree vigorously and fundamentally over their proposed cuts in veterans programs and programs that affect Federal workers, I believe that a number of the Commission's other cost-saving measures make sense. Therefore, I would propose a package of general Government spending cuts that features a combination of my own reductions and others proposed by the Grace Commission, the Heritage Foundation, and the Congressional Budget Office. They are:

One, save $6.6 billion by selling to the private sector one-third of the most delinquent debts owed the Government, and take aggressive action to do a better job of collecting the remaining bad debts owed to Uncle Sam. We must and we can do a better job of collecting the $35 billion in overdue student loans and other debts than we have in the past.

Two, save $1.0 billion by cutting the amount the Government spends on consultant services.

Three, save $750 million by adopting the DeConcini and Grace Commission recommendations for cutting Government travel and transportation.

Four, save $468 million by adopting the DeConcini and Grace Commission recommendations for reducing the size and cost of the 431,000 federally owned limousines, cars, and trucks, and using the private sector more for motor vehicle fleet services.

Five, save $570 million by adopting the Heritage Foundation and Grace Commission recommendations to charge more to space shuttle users and to sell unused space launching services formerly performed by NASA. NASA is getting out of the expendable rocket business.

Six, save $488 million by adopting the Grace Commission recommendations regarding management improvements in Government printing, reproduction, and audiovisual activities.

Seven, save $120 million by adopting the DeConcini-proposed reductions in public affairs and public relations activities by the Government.

Eight, save $1 billion or about 5.7 percent in fiscal year 1985 by cutting foreign aid. This could be achieved without altering our long-term Camp David commitments to Israel or the Middle East, which I vigorously support.

Nine, save $45 million by cutting Federal office space by 15 percent next year.

Fourth, apply a 2- or 3-percent reduction to Federal and military cost-of-living pay raises; to entitlement increases tied to the Consumer Price Index (CPI) which are not based on the beneficiary's income; and to income tax indexing. Under this proposal, the recent Federal pay raise of 3.5 percent for civilians and 5.5 percent for military would be reduced 2 or 3 percent. Similarly, a 7-percent, CPI-based inflationary increase would be reduced by 2 or 3 percent, leaving the entitlement beneficiary with a 5- or 4-percent increase for the year. Finally, indexing of personal income taxes would be reduced by the same percentages. Estimates are that the CPI-less 2 or 3 percent proposal would save $5.6 billion in fiscal year 1985 in the nonmeans tested entitlements and indexing programs and $180 billion over 6 years. The reduction in pay raises would save another $876 million to $1.5 billion in fiscal year 1985.

Let me make one thing absolutely clear. I would only consider this last proposal if it were a part of a total budget deficit reduction package that included the other spending reductions I have outlined above. If the package is not accepted as a whole, I will not support it. I will not accept a piecemeal approach that hurts one sector at the expense of another.

Fifth, passage of my flat tax proposal which would place an across-the-board rate—not to exceed 19 percent—on all forms of personal and corporate income. Whether a person was earning $10,000 or $10 million a year, he would pay taxes on essentially all of his income—except the very poor who would pay no tax at all. There would be no deductions except for dependents, and all shelters and special privileges would be eliminated. I am encouraged to see that the President has asked his Treasury Secretary to examine simplified tax proposals and report back by Christmas. If my flat tax proposal were adopted, the Federal Government would cut about $65 billion more from the deficit in fiscal year 1985 than it would under the complicated, torturous and unfair system we have today.

Even without adoption of my flat tax proposal, the sum total of my budget reduction package would be $67 billion in fiscal year 1985. Had my package been adopted in 1984, we would have saved $97 billion.

Our deficits must be brought down. That is not a matter of politics or party—that is a matter of simple economic survival.●

US WEST: NEW CHALLENGES FOR A NEW COMPANY

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the breakup of AT&T has affected nearly every person in this country. It has forced all of us to make decisions about the phone service we have and will need in the future.

Divestiture has also created seven new regional holding companies to provide regulated phone service, as well as other nonregulated business activities. US WEST is one of those companies and is responsible for providing service to a 14 State area, from Washington to Minnesota and from Montana to the Mexican border. It includes three telephone companies—Mountain Bell, Pacific Northwest Bell, and Northwestern Bell—as well as several new, for-profit subsidiaries.

Divestiture has created many challenges for US WEST. They must continue to provide high quality phone service, while at the same time diversifying into a variety of for-profit activities.

US WEST's CEO, Mr. Jack A. MacAllister, recently outlined this challenge in a speech before the Federal Communications Bar Association. According to Mr. MacAllister, divestiture "invites and encourages diversification rather than suppresses it" and consumers, ratepayers and shareholders will benefit from diversification because "divestiture truly separates competitive offerings from monopoly resources and requires all services to stand upon their own financial feet."

US WEST and its operating companies and subsidiaries will be free to innovate and provide better service to consumers. This will include maintaining high-quality telephone service, as well as new services such as personal communications devices, methods of exchanging information and ways to deliver entertainment.

Mr. MacAllister's remarks outline the challenges facing US WEST and I urge my colleagues to carefully review his thoughtful remarks.

Mr. President, I ask that Mr. MacAllister's remarks be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

BELL BREAKUP: NEW OPPORTUNITIES TO DIVERSIFY

(By James MacAllister President and Chief Executive Officer, US WEST)

This is an interesting time to be talking about diversification. The SEC filings for the seven new regional holding companies were issued less than a month ago. "When-issued" trading began a few days after that. On January 1, 1984, we become a publicly-held company. Not just any publicly-held company, but one approximating the size of General Electric, Xerox, RCA or General Telephone.

We have three million shareholders watching us. Seventy-five thousand employees. The courts. The Justice Department. A few hundred competitors. Even more suppliers. I don't know how many financial analysts. Thousands of brokers—licking thier chops.

What's that old line—"it's not paranoia if they're really out to get you!"

Three months ago Howard Doerr, our chief financial officer at US WEST, told a group of analysts in San Francisco that our new subsidiaries would probably not turn a profit for three years. A week later, we were treated to a national column which said Mr. Doerr had flashed a negative signal about our prospects.

Now, I'm not an analyst. I'm not a columnist. But if anyone told me that you could invest up to forty million dollars in a new company with a new service and make it profitable within three years, I would consider that a positive signal.

I don't tell that story to criticize columnists or analysts. Those of us who speak for the seven new regional companies are going to have to get smart quickly, and understand how the financial marketplace responds.

I tell that story because it is my lesson for the day.

Such investments have been taking place in the telephone business for years. It just never occurred to outsiders that they should analyze them. In fact, new ventures have been so buried in mountains of regulation and monopoly revenues, that they have seldom been held up for public examination on their own merits.

All of those new ventures operated with a safety net—a safety net of monopoly resources and regulation. All of those new ventures were regulated.

If they were successful, their profits supported local rates.

If they were not successful, the cost was borne by the ratepayer.

By separating our regulated and nonregulated activities at US WEST, we put new ventures at risk. A risk borne by the shareowner, not the ratepayer.

It seems to me that is exactly what divestiture is all about—cutting monopoly revenues cleanly and clearly away from competitive ventures and competitive investment decisions. Not to limit competitive behavior, but to clearly separate it from monopoly resources.

That is what we believe at US WEST. And that is why we have structured our organization and accounting policies with a clear and precise separation of the local Bell operating companies we own from the new competitive subsidiaries which we are establishing.

We believe that divestiture invites and encourages diversification rather than suppresses it.

A LOT OF BEGETTING GOING ON

In fact, for the past two decades, diversification has been occurring throughout the telecommunications industry. Spurred first by technology and then by the Carterfone and MCI decisions, new businesses—new competitors—arrive by the score every year. Twenty years ago, do you suppose anyone could have imagined the success of MCI, Sprint, COMSAT, the resellers, Rolm, TIE, plus dozens of paging and mobile communications suppliers?

Look at other telephone companies. Not the Bell System. We've been so big that you don't see the trees for the forest. But do look at the strategy and structure of United Tel or Continental.

Look, for that matter, at our neighbors to the north—Bell Canada.

I don't pretend to speak for Bell Canada. I'm just an observer. But it seems to me that there may be lessons to be learned up there.

By my count—and I counted from a chart that is nearly two years old—Bell Canada has ownership positions—ranging from thirty to one hundred percent—in 82 firms.

Eighty-two!

Bell Canada begat 55 per cent of Northern Telecom, Ltd., which begat Northern Telecom, Inc., which begat Northern Telecom Finance Corporation, which begat an acceptance corporation.

Bell Canada also begat The Capital Telephone Company which begat TeleDirect which begat Bell Communications Systems, and a woodtreating company, and a Yellow Pages publishing company in Australia, and these companies in turn begat printing companies and mailing companies and . . . well, you get the idea.

There's been a whole lot of begetting going on.

I admire Bell Canada.

It seems to me they are the current leaders in a strategy that makes a lot of sense. And if they can keep monopoly revenues separate while they venture into new enterprises and serve the shareholder well . . . then I believe they will also serve the consumer well.

TIED DOWN WITH REGULATORY STRINGS

When you look at the number of competitors coming through the door, when you review the diversification strategy of other telephone companies, then it follows that you must at least consider the possibility that Bell System resources may truly have resembled a giant tied down with regulatory strings.

Example: Advanced mobile communications service has been a technology waiting to be used—caught up in courts, commissions, and legal arguments while the public waited to be served.

Example: If you free Bell Labs research and Western Electric production know-how to search for new ways to use chip technology, the public may be served with new computer and information applications yet to be discovered.

Example: If we free the managers and craftspeople of the telephone industry from the straitjacket of unnecessary regulation and practices, we allow them the time and creativity to serve the customer better.

The time we have spent to prepare crates of information to justify a ten cent increase on the monthly rental of a Princess telephone—that time has not been worth it.

The money we spent on legal fees and the energy we spent on nickel and dime increases—that time and energy have not been worth it.

LET THE MARKETPLACE DECIDE

The marketplace makes better decisions about price than regulators and it makes them more efficiently. If devestiture truly separates competitive offerings from monopoly resources and requires all services to stand upon their own financial feet, then we are free to innovate and—yes—to diversify.

You do not have to look forward to the future—or toward exotic new services—to see the diversification opportunities apparent in divestiture.

Just look at the here and now.

Divestiture does not create seven new companies. It creates at least thirty—and perhaps as many as fifty—as we come out of the chute. Multiply the regions, AMPS, CPE and Directory by seven—then add the new ideas.

Multiply those companies by the responsibility we have thrust upon their managers. Multiply them by their regional differences. Then you begin to see the diversification which is possible.

I have no doubt, for example, that the regional companies will seek different applications for their cellular technology—their regional characteristics will force them to do so. Nynex faces a different set of circumstances than US WEST. Ameritech will think differently than the Southwestern Bell Corporation. Their differences will drive technology toward new uses, new applications, new markets, new businesses . . . toward diversification.

TUNING INTO THE INFORMATION AGE

What are the opportunities ahead?

In my opinion they fit into these categories:

First—We will tune into the Information Age—which has so far offered more bluster than real services. We will find new computer applications, new methods of exchanging information, new ways to deliver entertainment.

Second—We will move toward personal communications services and devices—mobile communications, alarm devices, services that provide security and protection, or simply keep people in touch.

Third—The telephone companies themselves will begin to make more strategic use of their piece parts—billing and payroll systems, equipment applications, and central office services.

Fourth—All of the companies will begin to diversify through their existing businesses by extending their services and their know-how. Bell Canada is certainly supplying us lessons in how to do that. Publishing, mailing, financing subsidiaries, in-house communications networks, property management subsidiaries—you name it, I think you'll see it—in one company or another.

Fifth—We are being offered joint ventures by suppliers—the makers of central office equipment, computers, property developers. Some of them are bound to get off the drawing board and into a real business.

Sixth—And most important—divestiture will free the creativity of the people who run this industry. They are good people. They are bright people. And they are going to surprise you.

MORE CHOICE—BETTER SERVICE

US WEST is not a telephone company. We happen to own three communications companies which are currently regulated.

This separation of our new unregulated companies from our regulated Bell operating companies drove us toward independent profit centers with strict accounting separation.

We believe this separation will help us serve customers better—by exploring new ventures, seeking new opportunities and offering the public more choices.

If we are to compete in the global communications market, if we are to bring benefits to the shareowner, the customer, and to employees, the competitive companies of US WEST must be allowed to compete on the same basis as other American and international companies. Otherwise, the United States will end up on the tag end of this huge and growing market—and the Japanese, the Europeans and the Canadians will reap the rewards.

We believe the divestiture document provides us with the opportunity of going forward in this world-wide industry.

Divestiture—by separating competitive businesses from monopoly revenues—will drive us toward accurate cost accounting. It will drive us toward serving the customer better. It will drive us toward inventing new services and seeking new opportunities. That is diversification.

The regulated industry itself is subject to competition and that competition will continue to grow.

The theory of allowing competition to act in lieu of regulation should mean more deregulation for the telephone companies in order that they, too, may offer the customer more choice.

In a competitive world the marketplace is the decision-maker. It permits us to compete for a level of service which the customers themselves determine to be in their best interest.

I believe that if we follow the logic and the rules of the marketplace, the customer will truly benefit from a wide range of choice.

Diversification has been going forward in this industry for more than a decade. It will become even more apparent in the decade ahead. The customer, the shareowner, and this country—I believe—will be better served because of it.●

FOLLOWUP NECESSARY AFTER NUCLEAR POWER MISHAPS

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, last week marked the fifth anniversary of the crisis at the Three Mile Island nuclear power station in Pennsylvania. There was not a lot of fanfare surrounding the event, and I am not aware that any Senator made a point to remember the event on the floor of the Senate.

However, you can be certain, Mr. President, that the residents who live near the TMI plant remember. Most of the ratepayers who live in that part of Pennsylvania, and many in New Jersey, remember when each month they pay a utility bill that is higher because of the cost of the inoperable TMI plant.

Mr. President, last February marked another anniversary regarding the nuclear power industry, one that pertains to the Salem nuclear generating station that sits just across the river from Delaware. On February 23, for the second time in a year, I participated in a hearing held by the Senate Subcommittee on Nuclear Regulation of the Committee on Environment and Public Works to question the Commissioners of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) and to get an update on the status of Salem. This hearing was being held 1 year after the date on which that plant's automatic safety system failed to function. It was eventually determined last year that a variety of mechanical and management failures led to the system failure, and the plant operators were fined a record $850,000.

The Senate will recall, Mr. President, that when the Salem plant failed to shut down automatically twice in a 3-day period in February 1983, I took to the Senate floor several times to express concerns about the Salem plant and the NRC investigation.

Mr. President, I am sorry to report that what I learned at the Environment Committee hearing has me worried. After the incident at Salem last year, the NRC and the NRC staff spent hundreds of hours over several months investigating what had happened. They recommended a long list of changes for the plant, including many affecting the day-to-day operations at the plant. Following this lengthy investigation, the Commissioners somewhat reluctantly allowed a restart of the plant in May 1983. What I learned at the last month's hearing, however, was that the Commissioners have never followed up on the mishaps at Salem. They have not determined whether the corrective actions that they believed necessary following the accidents last year have, in fact, been made. On the other hand, senior NRC staff present at the hearing indicated the progress being made at Salem has been quite slow.

Mr. President, I have never been a great fan of the way the nuclear industry is run. But I am also quite practical. I know it is difficult to keep plants, for which replacement power would be expensive and difficult to get, and that represent billion-dollar investments, shut down while all the sins of the nuclear industry are cured. But I have strongly supported efforts to tighten up on the operation of nuclear plants.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we fail to learn from the lessons of TMI and Salem and many other plants like these if we do not follow up, and the Commissioners, whose job it is to watch the nuclear industry, do not follow up. I tried to stress my continuing interest in this matter to the NRC Commissioners at the recent environment hearing but I believe more vigilance will be needed. I will continue my efforts.

Mr. President, I ask that a short statement I gave at the Environment Committee hearing on February 23d appear in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JOSEPH R. BIDEN, JR., SENATE COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS, SUBCOMMITTEE ON NUCLEAR REGULATION, FEBRUARY 23, 1984

Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and the Environment Committee for allowing me to join you today and to ask a few questions of these distinguished witnesses about a matter which I believe is of continuing concern, not only to myself and the citizens of Delaware, but also to this committee and all people in the United States.

Yesterday marked an anniversary of sorts, but not an anniversary deserving of celebration. A year and a day ago, on February 22, 1983, the Salem 1 nuclear reactor, which is physically located in New Jersey, but sits right across the Delaware River from Delaware City, Del., failed to perform its most important and basic function, it failed to stop automatically, even though its highly automated system was telling it that a dangerous condition existed in the plant and that the nuclear reaction should be halted.

To make matters worse, not only did the supposedly "fail-safe" mechanism fail and the plant experience an event that the nuclear industry has argued would never occur, but plant personnel and supervisors did not even notice that Salem had experienced the first, what the technicians call, "Anticipated Transient Without Scram," at a licensed nuclear reactor in the United States. In other words, an anticipated event in the complex operation of this plant occurred, such as loss of a water pump, and the automatic safety system failed to shut down the nuclear reaction. The only reason we found out about the February 22nd incident was that the same system failed again three days later, on February 25th.

Investigation by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission has attributed the mechanical failures to safety related parts which were completely worn out and improperly maintained. The NRC investigation has also shown that a key component in the mishaps was a wide variety of human, administrative and management failures. In fact management failures were so pervasive at this plant with regard to the events leading up to and including the 22nd and 25th events, the NRC fined the plant owners a record $850,000. Another and perhaps more alarming conclusion from the NRC investigation was that the Salem plant operations represent those typical for the industry. In other words, the lackadaisical attitude toward safety at the Salem plant replicates itself in nuclear plants all over the country.

Mr. Chairman, I did not come here to give a speech on the facts of record at Salem or particularly to make an indictment of the nuclear power industry. I did, however, come to ask these witnesses to speak to the subject of the current status of the Salem operation, the impact the startling events there have had on other plants and the industry, and how the NRC has itself changed its operations in response to the problems found at Salem and other plants.

In many ways, Mr. Chairman, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission acts a lot like the teacher in a classroom with a number of disruptive and uncontrollable students. The teacher has a limited number of tools by which he or she can single out one of the troublemakers and hope that the rest of them behave for a while. The teacher can also suspend a student on occasion and hope that the individual student will conform to classroom decorum upon return. But the troublemakers have a way of returning to the classroom one way or another and the bulk of any attitudinal change on their part will be of their own making.

The economic imperatives behind a functioning nuclear power plant inevitably mean that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission will be pressured to put a plant, even a troubled plant, back on line. Frankly, that is what I am concerned happened at Salem. I do not fault you for your predicament, but the long history of problems at Salem, both major and minor make me worry that history will repeat itself. The Three Mile Island incident has already shown us that some classroom troublemakers can self-destruct.●

ANTITERRORISM REWARDS ACT OF 1984 (S. 2309)

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on February 9, I introduced S. 2309, the Antiterrorism Rewards of 1984. Since then, the distinguished Senators from Maine (Mr. COHEN), Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), Colorado (Mr. HART), and Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), have joined as cosponsors.

The bill would create a $10 million fund from which the Secretary of State could pay rewards for information or services concerning terrorist acts abroad directed against U.S. persons and property. The fund would also be available to the Attorney General to supplement his present authority to pay rewards concerning terrorist activities in this country.

This measure is offered principally as a response to the alarming increase in terrorist violence abroad directed against our Nation, which accounted for the deaths of 274 Americans last year. In 1984, the United States continues to be a favored target of terrorists. In February, Leamon Hunt, the Director General of the Sinai Peacekeeping Force was murdered in Rome. Last month, Robert Homme, our Consul General in Strasbourg, France, was wounded. Yesterday, Army M. Sgt. Robert Judd, Jr., of the U.S. Military Acceptance Group was shot near our air base outside of Athens. The attempt on Sergeant Judd brought to mind the assassination in Athens of U.S. Navy Capt. George Tsantes, of the Joint Military Advisory Group, in November 1983, as well as the killing in 1975 of Richard Welch who was the CIA's station chief in that city. It also served to remind that the persons responsible for those killings have not yet been brought to justice. These incidents are discussed in news reports in the New York Times of February 21 and March 27 and the Washington Post of April 4, which I ask be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

I do not wish to be understood as suggesting that this legislation would be a sufficient deterrent to, or remedy for, terrorism. But it could be helpful. For example, the Secretary of State could make arrangements with the concerned foreign governments to post a schedule of rewards for information or services leading to prosecution in the cases I mentioned.

It is of course of paramount importance to prevent terrorist acts. I need not remind you of the awful possibility that the summer Olympic games in Los Angeles will be exploited by terrorists. Under this bill the Secretary and the Attorney General would have flexibility to fashion offers and payments which could provide incentives for witnesses to come forward and, perhaps, for coconspirators to betray their treacherous comrades before they do any harm.

Mr. President, S. 2309 has been referred to the Subcommittee on Security and Terrorism of the Judiciary Committee. I am hopeful that the subcommittee will hold early hearings on the bill. I also urge my colleagues to join in sponsoring this legislation.

AMERICAN DIPLOMAT SHOT IN STRASBOURG; WOUNDS SUPERFICIAL

(By John Vinocur)

PARIS, March 26.—A gunman, firing five times at close range, shot and wounded the United States consul general in Strasbourg today as he left his home there.

The diplomat received what doctors called "superficial wounds."

A group calling itself the Lebanese Armed Revolutionary Factions took responsibility for the attack on the envoy, Robert Onan Homme, 43 years old, who has been the consul in Strasbourg since 1981. A note mailed at noon today to Agence France-Presse by the group said, "Mr. Homme was already well known for his activities as a member of the C.I.A."

Officials at the American Embassy in Paris said Mr. Homme was not with the Central Intelligence Agency but was a career diplomat and political officer whose main task was representing the United States at the European Economic Community's institutions in Strasbourg, notably the European Parliament.

A police spokesman said, "All hypotheses are under investigation at this time," including the possibility that the attack was related to the dismissal by the consul general of a French domestic employee some time age.

An American diplomat in Strasbourg said Mr. Homme told him he was backing out of the driveway at his house about 8:55 a.m. when he saw a man with a gun pointed at him. Mr. Homme tried to accelerate, and his car spun as the man opened fire, the dipomat said.

Mr. Homme was grazed by bullets near his left eye and on his left chest, the American official said. He was also bruised on the neck, apparently by a bullet. A hospital medical report described the wounds as "superficial and without the likelihood of serious aftereffects." Mr. Homme was not operated on and never lost consciousness.

"It was a case of fractions of centimeters," the police spokesman said. "The consul is a very lucky man."

The bullets and shell casings collected by the police were from a 7.65-millimeter pistol, a light weapon of a type used in attacks on American and Israeli diplomats in France in which the Lebanese Armed Revolutionary Factions claimed involvement. Lieut. Col. Charles Robert Ray, the assistant American military attaché at the embassy, was killed by a 7.65-millimeter bullet in Paris in 1982, and Christian A. Chapman, the chargé d'affaires, escaped injury when shots were fired at him from a similar weapon in 1981.

LINK TO ISRAELI'S DEATH

The organization also said it killed a second secretary at the Israeli Embassy in Paris, Yacov Barsimantov, who was shot by a young woman in 1982.

The mailed statement to Agence France-Press was typed and contained several spelling errors. It said, "The Yanki imperialists are preparing new aggression, this time through the intermediary of the Zionist occupation forces." It said that because of "the Israeli occupation and the massacres orchestrated by the Yankis, we are completely within our rights to attack the enemies of the people wherever they are."

The statement also denounced what it called "the complicity of the yellow Socialists" and "French imperialists who try to camouflage their intervention in Lebanon."

The French police have investigated possible links between the organization and Action Directe, a French extreme left-wing terrorist group. Two members of Action Directe were arrested last week.

The police description of the assailant firing on Mr. Homme was that of a man in his 30's, of Asian or Mediterranean origin, wearing a beige overcoat. The diplomat told American officials he did not get a good look at the gunman, who was wearing a motorcycle helmet. The assassin escaped on a motorbike.

Mr. Homme, who is married and has three children, has also served in Mexico, Colombia, Italy and Panama. From 1975 to 1981, the American Embassy said, he was at the State Department in Washington in charge of the Common Market desk, then was director of personnel for Europe.

ATHENS GUNMEN SHOOT U.S. ARMY SERGEANT

(By Andriana Ierodiaconou)

ATHENS, April 3.—Two unidentified gunmen on a motorcycle shot and seriously wounded a U.S. serviceman near an American airbase on the eastern outskirts of Athens, Greek police and U.S. Embassy officials said today.

Embassy officials identified the victim as Army Master Sgt. Robert H. Judd Jr., 36, a postal officer with the Joint U.S. Military Assistance Group here. Judd, who is married and has two daughters, has been in Greece 18 months.

By late tonight, no one had claimed responsibility for the shooting of Judd. Last Nov. 15, U.S. Navy Capt. George Tsantes, of the same office, was shot and killed here. Responsibility was claimed by a shadowy terrorist group calling itself the November 17 organization, which also claimed responsibility for the assassination of CIA station chief Richard Welch here in 1975.

Last Saturday, a British diplomat was shot and killed on a street in downtown Athens by an unidentified gunman who, according to witnesses, spoke Arabic. There have been no arrests in any of the attacks.

[In Washington, State Department spokesman John Hughes said, "We are deeply concerned about the increased level of terrorist acts directed against American officials," Reuter reported.]

Police said Judd was driving from downtown to the air base at Hellenikon along coastal Vouliagmenis Avenue in late afternoon when the shooting occurred.

The two gunmen, riding a red motorcycle, approached his car from behind as he was stopped at a red light, witnesses said. They fired three times and sped off.

Judd, who was hit twice, with one bullet entering his left shoulder and lodging in his lung and the other hitting his right wrist, managed to drive the 1½ miles to the gate of the air base to seek help.

He was taken to a hospital where he was reported in satisfactory condition and out of danger after surgery to remove the bullet from his lung.

A third bullet was recovered from Judd's car and the motorcycle used by the gunmen was later found about a mile from the site of the shooting, authorities said.

"This is a crime which causes us concern," a Greek police spokesman said. "We have gone into full mobilization to catch those responsible. We have some descriptions but they are not very clear."

Today's attack came just two days after Secretary of Defense Caspar W. Weinberger visited Athens for discussions about United States-Greek defense matters.

American officials said security here has been stepped up in recent weeks following a rash of terrorist threats and assassination incidents worldwide.

The Greek government has provided added plainclothed security protection for high-ranking U.S. Embassy staffers in Athens since the Tsantes killing. But western intelligence sources say there is little information-sharing on terrorist activity here between the Greek intelligence services and American and Western European agencies.

RED BRIGADES THREATEN ANOTHER U.S. DIPLOMAT

ROME, Feb. 20 (Reuters).—Letters sent to Italian news organizations purporting to come from Red Brigades guerrillas today threatened the life of another United States diplomat in the aftermath of last week's killing of Leamon R. Hunt, director general of the multinational force in Egypt's Sinai Peninsula.

The letters, signed by the "militarist wing" of the Red Brigades and sent to the Rome dailies Il Giornale d'Italia and Il Manifesto and the Milan office of the Italian news agency ANSA, took responsibility for the Hunt shooting.

The letter sent to ANSA read: "The militarist wing of the Red Brigades claims the assassination of the dirty guarantor American general Leamon R. Hunt. NATO out of Italy. Imperialist forces out of Lebanon. No to the missiles at Comiso. The militarist wing has another American diplomat in its sights. End of Red Brigades communique."

The document did not name a specific United States diplomat.

Mr. Hunt, 56 years old, was shot dead last Wednesday while returning from his office to his home in a Rome suburb. He was head of the 10-nation force in Sinai that monitors the Egyptian-Israeli peace treaty.●

THE PRESIDENT'S REPORT TO CONGRESS ON U.S. POLICY ON ASAT ARMS CONTROL

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, on Monday, the Senate received from the President a report to the Congress on U.S. policy on ASAT arms control. Having reviewed that paper, I must tell my fellow Members that the paper is disappointing, but not particularly surprising.

After protracted study, the administration has concluded that "no arrangements or agreements beyond those already governing military activities in outer space have been found to date that are judged to be in the overall interest of the United States and its allies."

The administration's report does a good job of identifying every conceivable reason not to seek an agreement on antisatellite weapons with the Soviets. Totally missing is any serious attempt to assess the benefits of space arms control.

The principal concerns cited as bars to ASAT arms control measures are verification difficulties, the diversity of threats to the West's satellites, and threats posed by Soviet targeting and reconnaissance satellites. I would like to address each of these three concerns.

Verification has become the catchword behind which many in the administration hide in hope it will obscure their adamant opposition to progress in arms control. As the verification subterfuge has been used time and time again to block forward progress on many arms control issues—including the Threshold Test Ban Treaty, the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, a chemical weapons ban, an agreement on conventional troop reductions in Europe, and now, Asat's—the unfortunate resistance of the administration to arms control progress has become steadily clearer.

Everyone understands by now the importance of verification. The issue is not whether we should have effective verification of arms control agreements. This issue is whether the need for effective verification shall be a standard, or simply an excuse.

Last year, when I led an official Senate delegation to Moscow, we queried the late Soviet president, Yuri Andropov, as to whether he would agree to effective verification in new arms control agreements. He indicated several times that he would. I would not argue that we should take Soviet leaders at their word. I would argue, however, that we should be willing to put their word to the test. Only through negotiation can we ascertain their willingness to have good verification.

It is true, as the administration claims, that there are diverse Soviet threats to our satellites. This should be a matter of concern to us, given our heavy reliance on satellites for commercial and governmental communication, as well as for military and intelligence purposes. Since we and our allies are considerably more dependent upon satellites than are the Soviets and their allies, it makes sense to try to deal with the reduce the Soviet threat. Instead, the administration throws up its hands in feigned despair and claims nothing can be done.

The third obstacle to effective ASAT arms control cited by the administration is the threat posed by Soviet targeting and reconnaissance satellites, particularly against our Navy. The administration makes it clear that it wants to be able to shoot down threatening Soviet satellites. In other words, a main obstacle to ASAT agreement is the administration's desire to be able to blast Soviet satellites. Simply put, the administration prefers an antisatellite weapons race.

We must ask, how can a professed desire on our part to be able to strike their satellites do anything but encourage the Soviets to improve their own limited ASAT system? With an ASAT race on, can anyone doubt that a space weapons race will be close behind? I, for one, conclude that such a course can be followed only at almost unimaginable peril and cost.

Fortunately, there is a more sensible approach to space-related weapons available. It is embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 129, of which the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) and the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. PRESSLER) and I are principal cosponsors. This resolution, which was approved unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations last year, calls for a mutual and verifiable moratorium of limited duration on ASAT tests, resumption of ASAT negotiations, and an urgent effort to negotiate a ban on space-directed and space-based weapons. I hope that the distinguished leaders will be able to find time in the Senate schedule soon for consideration of this critically important measure.

In regard to ASAT tests, I wrote the President last December 31, urging that the impending ASAT test not be conducted. Unfortunately, the suggestion was not accepted. I recently received a full response to my suggestion. The response has just been declassified. Like the report, the letter holds out little real prospect that this administration will pursue any space-related arms control initiative. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this White House response to me, which should be of particular interest to Members, be inserted in the RECORD following my remarks.

Mr. President, I was encouraged last August when the late President Andropov told my delegation of Soviet willingness to dismantle existing Asat's and to ban new ones. I have been disappointed by the administration's unwillingness to discuss this offer with the Soviets. It is clear in its report that the administration continues to have no interest in finding out how serious the Soviets are.

I deeply wish that this administration would stop devoting so much of its energy to trying to prove to a dubious public that arms control cannot be achieved for this or that or 100 other reasons. A far better course would be to follow the example of President Kennedy, who, during the Cuban missile crisis, seized on the positive—rather than the unacceptable—aspects of the Soviet position and built toward a successful resolution.●

THE DEATH OF JOHN E. LOOMIS, DISTINGUISHED LAWYER, FRIEND, AND NEIGHBOR

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I honor today the memory of a truly dedicated citizen, who was a friend and neighbor of mine in northern Virginia. John E. Loomis, senior partner in one of Washington's distinguished law firms, died of a heart attack March 15, 1984.

He was an expert of national note in the fields of association, securities, and international law.

John began his legal practice in Milwaukee in 1949. In 1957 he moved to Washington where he served as Associate Director of the Division of Trading and Exchanges and also the Division of Corporate Regulation for the Securities and Exchange Commission. He also served as General Counsel of the Development Loan Fund. In the early 1960's John left the bureaucracy and joined a private law firm becoming senior partner in Loomis, Own, Fellman and Howe.

John Loomis authored two books: "Public Money Sources for Overseas Trade and Investment" and, "International Finance, Official Agencies and U.S. Business." In recent years he had served as General Counsel of the International Foundation of Employee Benefit Plans and as a member of the Advisory Board of the Bureau of National Affairs, Security Regulation and Law Report. He had served as an editor of the Yale Law Journal and attended law school at the University of Michigan and later graduated from the Yale School of Law.

Prior to his legal studies and career John served in the Army Air Corps from 1945 to 1948 in the China-Burma-India theater.

John's firm was not the largest in Washington. There are many big law firms in this town. But his firm distinguished itself in representing about 150 different trade associations in their dealings with the Federal Government.

Survivors include his wife, Dorothy, daughter Jamie, and son John, all of McLean, Va., and sisters Marijo Shide of Larimore, N. Dak., and Louise Wellman of Denver, Colo.

John Loomis gave a lifetime of service in many areas to the people of this Nation which he so greatly revered. Too few are so dedicated.●

NEW ENGLAND REGIONAL ELECTRIC POWER PLANNING

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, New England Governors are meeting today in Rhode Island to discuss the financial difficulties facing the troubled Seabrook nuclear powerplant in New Hampshire.

This serious matter for New England and particularly Rhode Island consumers, is addressed in an excellent editorial in this morning's Providence Journal. The editorial, while focusing on the immediate concerns of the ailing Seabrook nuclear facility, also and most importantly, strongly endorses the need for a regional power planning entity for the New England region.

Mr. President, during the 97th Congress and in March 1983, I along with my distinguished colleague Senator ROBERT STAFFORD introduced legislation, S. 670 to provide for the establishment of a regional power authority for the six-State New England region. Participation in the compact would be entirely voluntary. In view of the need to more closely examine regional utility regulation, the legislation also requires the General Accounting Office to evaluate proposals to voluntarily consolidate utility rate regulation powers in regional or multi-State authorities.

Mr. President, I know the problems which face New England and particularly Rhode Island electric ratepayers, are not unique to our region. Many other regions face similar problems regarding costly generation facilities and the need for greater power planning to protect consumers. I hope that my colleagues will review this editorial and my legislation, S. 670 carefully. Such a measure I believe will go a long way in helping to ease the tremendous burden presently facing New England consumers and many others across the country.

I ask that the editorial from the Providence Journal be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

NEW ENGLAND UTILITIES NEED REGIONAL ELECTRIC PLANNING

New England's need for a regional electric power planning council was never more apparent than last week. All six states were affected by decisions made on the Seabrook, N.H., nuclear plant—to complete its first unit; to halt work on the second unit, and to offset part of the plant's cost with expected savings from use of Canadian hydropower.

But these decisions were made privately by utility executives and some government officials, responding to fast-moving events. A more orderly procedure, involving more participants, is needed so that the responses can be carefully tailored to the region's needs.

Today, New England governors are meeting in Rhode Island to discuss the impact on citizens' electric bills if some benefits of low-cost hydropower are applied to the financially strapped Seabrook project. If time allows, they should update each other on the regional power planning concept, to which the National Governor' Association (NGA) is already committed.

Two months ago, Governor Garrahy told a congressional subcommittee that the regional approach would contribute to the NGA's goal "of adequate, reliable supplies of electricity at the least possible cost." Congress ought to enact necessary permissive legislation, applicable to all states.

With such a law in hand, a regional power council could be formed by Rhode Island, Massachusetts and Connecticut, which share energy concerns, or one could serve all six New England states if they wished.

Participation in this program would be entirely voluntary. The council would forecast power demand and supply, explore reserve requirements, promote power pools and interconnections, and prepare import and export agreements with neighbors like Canada. But the legislation should also let the council work toward regional ratemaking and approving sites for new wholesale power plants, if it felt the units were needed.

Almost every utility is in the New England Power Pool (NEPOOL), which plans and executes multi-state sharing of electricity. In 1982, the governors and their utility regulators established a New England Power Planning Committee, which helped NEPOOL complete its agreement to buy Hydro Quebec's power.

This was an example of ad hoc cooperation between the utility Industry and government, in which Mr. Garrahy and Edward F. Burke, Public Utilities Commission chairman, led the way. Still lacking, however, is a permanent, stautory basis for arranging such multi-state projects.

The latest aid to Seabrook is intended to save the project's principal owner, Public Service Company of New Hampshire, from imminent bankruptcy. The rescue method, siphoning off some savings from Canadian hydropower, is controversial, because the six New England states do not have identical interests. For example, Vermont recently made its own independent deal to buy a small amount of Canadian electricity and is not enthusiastic about the Seabrook bailout. Rhode Island, which has to import almost all of its electricity from other states, fears that the Seabrook project might founder and is thus inclined to support the current salvage effort.

An atmosphere of haste hangs about the Seabrook solution. Through speedy maneuvering, New England has solved many of its energy problems. There are limits to "winging it," however, and a formal regional power entity is needed.●

DR. BENJAMIN ELIJAH MAYS: ONE OF OUR GREAT TREASURES

(By request of Mr. BYRD, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, with the death of Dr. Benjamin Elijah Mays on Wednesday, March 28, 1984, this country suffered the loss of one of its greatest national treasures. Dr. Mays was a multifaceted personality, once described by his former student Lerone Bennett, Jr., now senior editor of Ebony magazine, as "one of the last great schoolmasters of the 20th century."

Those who knew him of course, knew that he was much, much more. He was one of the country's most persistent voices for nonviolent social change. He served as the unchallenged mentor and spiritual leader of an entire generation of black leadership who had the good fortune to come under this tutelage during his 27-year tenure as president of Morehouse College in Atlanta, Ga.

It has often been said that the greatest teachers are those who instruct through example. It was by this method that Dr. Mays made his most significant and long-lasting contributions to our society, for it was through his personal example that he taught us about the unlimited capacity of the human spirit to achieve, and to overcome the degradations heaped upon it for over a century by a system designed to deny the basics of citizenship, and to impose second-class status on an entire race of Americans.

Born prior to the turn of the century in rural South Carolina, to parents who were both former slaves, Dr. Mays was 19 years old before he spent a full year in school. He was 22 years of age when he graduated from high school. He was 52 before he was allowed to cast his first ballot. He was 60 before the U.S. Supreme Court declared the South's system of apartheid to be unconstitutional. He was elected the first black president of the Atlanta Board of Education at 76 years of age. He remained in that office until his retirement 7 years later at age 83. He authored 7 books and received 49 honorary doctorate degrees, he served as a counselor and conscience to Presidents, was a founder of the United Negro College Fund and had scores of other achievements and accomplishments far too numerous to recount here.

In recalling Dr. Mays' many contributions, and in specifically recounting his impact upon one of the keenest and most analytical minds of our time,

Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young recently said that:

I always remember him as a strong, tall, brisk-walking intellectual giant . . . Dr. (Martin Luther) King used to say all the time that he awakened intellectually and spiritually listening to Dr. Mays preach in chapel. It was Dr. Mays who started Martin Luther King reading Gandhi.

Mr. President, with great personal respect and admiration for Dr. Mays, and in order to share with my colleagues the true spirit and essence of the life he led, it is with profound personal pleasure that I submit the following newspaper articles taken from the March 28 and 29 editions of the Atlanta Journal and Atlanta Constitution respectively:

DR. MAYS WAS ONE OF OUR GREAT TREASURES

(By Hank Ezell)

Tributes poured in throughout the day Wednesday as contemporaries and admirers came by or telephoned the home where Dr. Benjamin E. Mays had lived until his last days.

They remembered him as a humanitarian, a civil rights leader, a teacher without parallel, and as the patriarch who led a large family through good times and bad.

"My friends would ask me why I went on living with him," said Tawana Wimbish, a recent Spelman College graduate and a great-grandniece of Dr. Mays. "If it's for a man like him, I'll do anything."

Mays' death Wednesday brought a parade of people to pay sympathy calls on Ms. Wimbish and Cordelia Blount, a niece who also lived with the 89-year-old educator in the brick home in southwest Atlanta, only a few blocks from the high school which bears Mays' name.

In a study whose pine walls were crammed with family photographs and with dozens of the plaques and degrees which Mays was awarded during his distinguished career, Miss Blount recalled an increasingly frail man who, right into his last days, talked about the three more books he intended to write.

Among the dignitaries was Atlanta School Superintendent Alonzo Crim, who arrived only a few hours after Mays' death at 7:20 a.m. "He was a father and a friend to me," said Dr. Crim, who came to Atlanta while Mays was chairman of the school board. "He was one of our great treasures in Georgia. Most important, he was a maker of people. He was the last great master, in every sense of the word."

Jimmy Carter, the ex-president who once visited at Mays' house himself, sent words of praise for the man he called "a quiet and modest Christian gentleman, but at the same time a monumental figure in the field of education.

"He demonstrated a standard of personal wisdom, dedication and personal courage that helped to transform the social consciousness of our nation and served to enhance our country's leadership in the struggle for human rights," Carter said.

"I always remember him as a strong, tall, brisk-walking intellectual giant," said Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young. "Dr. (Martin Luther) King used to say all the time that he awakened intellectually and spiritually listening to Dr. Mays preach in chapel. It was Dr. Mays who started Martin Luther King reading Gandhi."

"He was always committed to the highest moral principles and the deepest spiritual values, and to intellectual excellence," said Fulton County Commission Chairman Michael Lomax. "I think he made his greatest contributions in education, and shaped a generation of black leaders."

Dr. Asa Yancey, a former member of the Atlanta Board of Education, recalled Mays' contributions in settling the lengthy battle that led to a court approved integration plan for Atlanta's public schools.

"He maintained a human approach toward everybody, friend as well as foe," Yancey said. "But he maintained the principles in which he believed. He was a very strong man, but a very kind and gentle man. He did not feel any animosity toward any human being."

Former Atlanta Mayor Ivan Allen Jr. said Mays was one of the most influential and able black leaders in the city during the civil rights days. "His leadership as an educator and as a public-spirited citizen have always been outstanding," Allen said. "I don't know anyone who's going to be more missed than Dr. Mays, or anyone I hold in higher respect."

A quiet atmosphere prevailed at Mays' house Wednesday afternoon. Friends whispered their condolences, and others hurried to answer an all but constantly ringing phone. Downstairs, in the stilled offices where Mays had until recently kept a secretary busy full time, Ms. Wimbish sat among dozens more plaques and tributes, talking of Dr. Mays' last days.

Though his body was weakening, Mays remained alert, she said. He talked of going to New York's Columbia University in May to receive yet another award.

On Sunday, she recalled, he had a hacking cough and congestion in his chest. Before leaving for Hughes Spalding Community Hospital, he sat down to talk with his great-grandniece. Dr. Mays had helped her get through Spelman, and he inquired whether now, as a working woman, her finances were adequate. Then he said to her, "You just make sure you pass on to your family the help that I've given you."

Those were the last words he spoke to her, Ms. Wimbish said.

DR. BENJAMIN MAYS DEAD AT 88

(By Tom Bennett)

Benjamin E. Mays, distinguished educator, mentor of the late Martin Luther King Jr., and an elegant symbol of black America's struggle for equality, died this morning after a brief hospitalization for respiratory problems. He was 88.

"Dr. Mays passed away at 7:20 a.m.," said Charles Delane, a spokesman at Hughes Spalding Community Hospital. "He had been in declining health for some time."

Delane said Mays was admitted to Hughes Spalding Sunday.

Funeral services had not yet been arranged.

Mays was a child of former slaves who rose to become president of Morehouse College and later, at an advanced age, chairman of the Atlanta Board of Education for 12 years. He elevated Morehouse's enrollment, endowment and national reputation. Later he steered the school board to a difficult compromise plan for complying with court-ordered desegregation.

Mays fought unstintingly for civil rights through non-violence, and his life was cited as an example of what all men could achieve through determination and courage.

He graduated from high school at 22, became president of Morehouse at 46, was permitted to vote for the first time at 52, and was elected the first black chairman of the Board of Education at 76, serving until he was 83.

He was acclaimed as an orator and was selected to eulogize King at the latter's funeral. Mays traveled widely, was appointed to numerous boards and offices, and achieved fame unmatched by any other black educator. Alex Haley recalled in "Roots" how, as a child, he was driven 100 miles by his parents so he could see Benjamin Mays.

"The achievements of the man would be astonishing for anybody," Samuel Dubois Cook wrote in the introduction to Mays' autobiography. "They are almost incredible in light of the environment of his childhood and formative years."

Benjamin Elijah Mays was born August 1, 1895 in Epworth, S.C., the youngest of eight children of Hezekiah and Louvenia Carter Mays. Mays' parents were tenant farmers who had been born into slavery before the Civil War.

"Everything in my environment told me that I was inferior," Mays wrote later. Negro disfranchisement was in full swing, erasing the gains of the Reconstruction era. Mays recalled how when he was four years old, a white mob formed in his community to instill fear in blacks, and ensure that Democratic primaries would remain all-white.

"I remember a crowd of white men rode up on horseback with rifles on their shoulders," Mays wrote later. "I was with my father when they rode up, and I remember starting to cry. They cursed my father, drew their guns and made him salute, made him take off his hat and bow down . . ."

The young Bennie Mays' heroes were black leaders—Booker T. Washington, Paul Lawrence Dunbar and Frederick Douglass. Mays was precocious. He recited the fifth chapter of Matthew in church and, he recalled: "When I was finished and went to my seat, the men were stomping their feet and the women were waiving their handkerchiefs. All around the community after that they said, 'Bennie is different.'"

He walked seven miles to school. He was determined to get an education and learn to become a man of pride, dignity and integrity in a society that "disinherited its black citizens," he said.

He was 22 when he graduated from the high school department of South Carolina State College in Orangeburg in 1916; he was valedictorian.

He enrolled at all-black Virginia Union College in Richmond. He made straight "As" but after one year, he transferred to all-white Bates College in Lewiston, Maine. He was steered there by his Virginia Union chemistry professor and faculty advisor, who were graduates of the school.

I had the foolish notion that northerners were smarter than southerners, and by surpassing them I could show my superiority to southerners," Mays said.

He paid his way by working in the dining hall and library; as a janitor, washing dishes in a downtown restaurant; and in the summertime, as a railroad porter, and painting buoys in a Boston shipyard. He believed his future was in the pulpit, and he was ordained in the ministry.

He had been admitted to Bates on academic probation; he graduated with honors (he was elected to Phi Beta Kappa belatedly, in 1935).

Mays later would be known for his oratorical prowess; it emerged at Bates. "Do you hear that rich mellow tone, that Southern dialect?" the yearbook of 1920 asked. "Who can it be with that enchanting ring to his voice, that clear deliberate enunciation to his oratory. That's Bennie Mays and say can't he speak? If you hear him once you will always remember him."

He set his sights on graduate study at the University of Chicago. He hoped to get there by working as a "deadhead" on a vacant Pullman car. However, the railroad had none available. Mays exhausted what funds he had, and prevailed upon a porter friend, who hid Mays in a linen closet from Cleveland to Chicago. Mays spent three quarters at Chicago, but other roles beckoned before he would complete his graduate work.

HIS FIRST JOBS

John Hope, president of Morehouse College, met Mays while at Chicago in 1920 and offered him a job teaching college mathematics and high school algebra at Morehouse for eight months for $1,200. Mays accepted and arrived in Atlanta in September 1921. It would not be a pleasant first visit.

"Going to Atlanta meant entering a new world in Negro-white relations," he wrote later. "Buying a ticket at a segregated window in a segregated waiting room in Atlanta and riding in a segregated coach on a train out of Atlanta was a most humiliating experience. . . . Everything was done to degrade Negroes.

"In and out of Atlanta, as elsewhere throughout the South, Negroes occupied the front coach on the train, half passenger car, half baggage car, next to the engine—the dirtiest, sootiest, noisiest, roughest location on the entire train."

Mays taught at Morehouse, and was pastor of the Shiloh Baptist Church, in 1921–24. He returned to Chicago for more graduate studies in 1924–25. He taught English at South Carolina State in 1925. He was executive secretary of the Tampa, Fla., Urban League in 1926–28; national student secretary of the Young Mens' Christian Association in 1928–30; and directed a study of Negro churches under the auspices of the Institute of Social and Religious Research in 1930–32.

He completed work for his doctorate at the University of Chicago in 1932–34. He received his degree in 1935.

Mays was dean of the School of Religion at Howard University in Washington, D.C., for six years, in 1934–40.

YEARS AT MOREHOUSE

When Mays was hired as the president of Morehouse in 1940, he found a faltering all-male black college financially weakened by the Depression and drained of much of its student body by war-time employment. He set about to reverse the school's fortunes. "It always has been an obsession of mine to build a school of academic excellence," he said later. "I worked on the belief that a black boy could get anything if it were put out there and he could compete for it."

Faculty members recalled that he would instruct them at meetings: "Whatever you do, do it so well that anyone looking will feel that the task was reserved especially for you by God himself."

Mays labored from 1953 to 1966 until he was at last able to persuade representatives of Phi Beta Kappa to establish a chapter at Morehouse. Today the school is one of only three black colleges in the country with the academic honorary unit, and one of four in Georgia, black or white.

Martin Luther King Jr. was among eleventh grade students admitted to Morehouse under its Early Admission Program in September 1944. King and Mays met in chapel. Thereafter Mays visited the King home in Atlanta, and the two of them chatted often on campus and in the president's office.

"Many times he would linger after my Tuesday morning address to discuss some point I had made—usually with approval, but sometimes questioning or disagreeing . . .," Mays recalled later. "There is no way one can know the degree of influence one has upon another. I can only say that I am honored to have had a small part in helping to mold one of the noblest spirits of our time."

King, in the book, "Stride Toward Freedom," identified Mays as his "spiritual mentor."

ACTIVISM BEGAN EARLY

As early as 1942, Mays had filed a discrimination suit against a railroad for installing a curtain separating black and white dining areas; the suit resulted in the desegregation of dining cars on Pullman trains. For the first time Mays could eat with whites on trains. "I had not known until that moment just how much resentment had grown in me," he wrote later. "As I sat there among the others, a thought overwhelmed me, and I almost wanted to say it out loud to them: 'I don't hate you any more.' "

In January 1951 he sounded another call, which became a frequent theme of his. He told the American Baptist Convention meeting in Buffalo, N.Y.: "In both the North and the South, the Christian church is the most highly segregated institution in the United States."

At the dawn of the civil rights movement, it was a Morehouse student, Hamilton Holmes, who became an integration pioneer. He left the school in 1960 to enroll, along with Atlantan Charlayne Hunter, as the first blacks at the previously all-white University of Georgia.

On March 14, 1960, a red-letter day in the civil rights movements, students came to Mays' home to inform him and seek his blessing for a new strategy. The next day they proposed to sit-in at segregated eating facilities at the state Capitol, Fulton County Courthouse, Atlanta City Hall, bus stations and 10 eating establishments. Mays actively supported the demonstrations.

In March 1962 President John Kennedy was considering appointing Mays to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. However, the move was opposed by Georgia U.S. Senators Richard Russell and Herman Talmadge.

The latter argued that Mays had been "identified with or associated with at least four different Communist-front organizations" Talmadge's source was the records of the House Un-American Activities Commission.

Talmadge told The Atlanta Constitution, "They ought to appoint some ordinary Americans rather than people who have made a business of agitating the civil rights cause. . . . Dr. Mays' whole career has been one of partisan activity and his service on the Civil Rights Commission would make him in effect a prejudiced juror. He could not approach this matter objectively."

Kennedy dropped his plans for appointing Mays.

The Morehouse president was the first Atlanta black leader to come out in support of the 1963 march on Washington, and took part in it. He endorsed the non-violent philosophy of Gandhi and King; later, while some whites were terming Mays a troublemaker, militant blacks were charging that he was too moderate.

He retired at 72 in 1967, after 27 years as Morehouse president. He was elected president emeritus. At the college's 100th commencement, Mays delivered a stinging rebuke to Atlanta citizens for what he termed their lack of support of Morehouse and other predominantly black schools. "The institutions of the Atlanta University Center have not been accepted by the people of Atlanta as their responsibility to help them develop and grow stronger," he said.

Morehouse graduates during Mays' tenure include King, former Atlanta mayor Maynard Jackson, state senator Julian Bond, Judge Horace Ward, Fulton County Commissioner Reginald Eaves and writer and historian Lerone Bennett.

Morehouse's enrollment doubled, its endowment quadrupled, and its faculty grew from having only two Ph.D.s to more than 50 percent with that degree while Mays was president.

SERVICE TO EDUCATION

After only two years of retirement, Mays entered the public arena again. He ran for the Seventh Ward seat on the Atlanta Board of Education and won in his first try for public office. He was 77. A North Carolina newspaper, checking facts in wire service stories, telephoned The Atlanta Journal to confirm that, indeed, the Atlanta school board had elected a 77-year-old man as its president.

The board was under a court order to further desegregate its classrooms. Tensions were running high and the group turned to Mays for leadership. On Jan. 2, 1970, the board, made up of seven whites and three blacks, elected Mays chairman on a 6–4 vote.

He received 200–300 letters and telegrams, he said. Among them was at least one which began with a salutation using a common racial slur.

Six times during the next 12 years, Mays was re-elected president. In 1974, he began a new term with a speech in which he paraphrased the Apostle Paul, commenting, "We must be neither male nor female, black nor white, district nor citywide, for we are all united at the feet of 90,000 children whom we are elected to serve."

He was instrumental in gaining support for the controversial "compromise" school desegregation plan, which he preferred to call the "Atlanta Plan."

He was a major force in thwarting teacher and classified employee strikes in 1975. Two years later, he easily won re-election over Mrs. Goldie C. Johnson, getting 64 percent of the vote. "My opponent made the mistake of making my age an issue," he said afterwards. He was 84.

He opposed a suit brought by American Civil Liberties Union lawyers calling for cross-country desegregation, saying it would not improve the quality of education. The litigants "don't have the best interests of the child at heart," he said. "They have the mistaken notion that if negroes are in school with white folks, they're going to better off. I can't believe that."

He retired at 86 in 1981. "He has been such a stabilizing force on the board," school attorney Warren Fortson said. "During the difficult times of desegregation, he probably single-handedly kept the board from splitting along racial lines. People so respected him that they would never do anything to dishonor him."

MOUNTAIN OF HONORS

He received 49 honorary doctorates between 1945 and 1981.

Numerous monuments to him remain in place. The school board suspended its policy against naming a facility for a living person, and Benjamin E. Mays High School opened in 1978. Sewell Road was renamed Benjamin Mays Drive in 1981. An intersection in his hometown of Epworth, S.C., where whites once terrorized his family, was named Mays Crossroads. A portrait of him hangs in the South Carolina capitol.

He authored seven books: "The Negro's Church," 1933; "The Negro's God," 1938; "A Gospel for the Social Awakening," 1950; "Seeking to be Christian in Race Relations," 1957; "Disturbed About Man," 1969; his autobiography, "Born to Rebel," 1971; and "Lord, The People Have Driven Me On," 1981.

Mays wrote 15 chapters in other books, 99 magazine articles, and various newspaper articles including a weekly column in the Pittsburgh Courier.

Perhaps the greatest tribute paid him was his selection by the King family to speak at the funeral of the slain civil rights leader in 1968. "Being asked to eulogize Dr. King is like asking me to eulogize one's deceased son, so close and so precious was he to me," Mays said.

"God called the grandson of a slave (said the son of slaves) and said to him, 'Martin Luther, speak to America about war and peace, speak to America about social justice, speak to America about racial discrimination, about its obligation to the poor.' "

He was president of the United Negro College Fund in 1958–61; member of the Advisory Council of the Peace Corps and the National Commission for UNSCO.

Mays was married to the former Sadie Gray. Mrs. Mays died at 69 in 1969, four days after her husband was first elected to the Board of Education. She was chairman of the board of an Atlanta nursing home for the aged, which was re-named in her honor after her death. The Mays had no children. He is survived by more than a dozen neices and nephews.

Looking back at the years of the civil rights movement, Mays told The Atlanta Constitution in 1981: "Any man who says there has been no progress is a fool. Progress has been made, but just not enough.

"I don't have to worry when I go downtown. When I go into a store, nobody is going to walk up to me and say, 'Boy, what you want?"

"For a long time I never asked a policeman anything, because he would give me a lecture. I don't hesitate now. In other words, I feel that I'm a free man in Atlanta."●

A WARNING ON NUCLEAR WINTER

(By request of Mr. BYRD, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, Dr. Carl Sagan is Duncan David professor of astronomy and space sciences at Cornell University. He is the recipient of the NASA medals for exceptional scientific achievement and (twice) for distinguished public service, the Peabody Award, and the Pulitzer Prize.

Dr. Sagan, in his article "Nuclear War and Climatic Catastrophe: Some Policy Implications," Foreign Affairs, winter 1983/84, volume 62, No. 2, makes painfully clear the imminent danger inherent in preparing ourselves for an unwinnable—unthinkable—nuclear war.

Mr. President, I ask that these remarks be printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

NUCLEAR WAR AND CLIMATIC CATASTROPHE: SOME POLICY IMPLICATIONS

(By Carl Sagan)

[Figures 1,2, and table 2 mentioned in article, not reproducible for the RECORD.]

It is not even impossible to imagine that the effects of an atomic war fought with greatly perfected weapons and pushed by the utmost determination will endanger the survival of man.—Edward Teller, Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, February 1947.

The extreme danger to mankind inherent in the proposal by [Edward Teller and others to develop thermonuclear weapons] wholly outweighs any military advantage.—J. Robert Oppenheimer, et al., Report of the General Advisory Committee, AEC, October 1949.

The fact that no limits exist to the destructiveness of this weapon makes its very existence and the knowledge of its construction a danger to humanity. . . . It is . . . an evil thing.—Enrico Fermi and I. I. Rabi, Addendum, ibid.

A very large nuclear war would be a calamity of indescribable proportions and absolutely unpredictable consequences, with the uncertainties tending toward the worse. . . . All-out nuclear war would mean the destruction of contemporary civilization, throw man back centuries, cause the deaths of hundreds of millions or billions of people, and, with a certain degree of probability, would cause man to be destroyed as a biological species . . . —Andrei Sakharov, Foreign Affairs, Summer 1983.

I

Apocalyptic predictions require, to be taken seriously, higher standards of evidence than do assertions on other matters where the stakes are not as great. Since the immediate effects of even a single thermonuclear weapon explosion are so devastating, it is natural to assume—even without considering detailed mechanisms—that the more or less simultaneous explosion of ten thousand such weapons all over the Northern Hemisphere might have unpredictable and catastrophic consequences.

And yet, while it is widely accepted that a full nuclear war might mean the end of civilization at least in the Northern Hemisphere, claims that nuclear war might imply a reversion of the human populations to prehistoric levels, or even the extinction of the human species, have, among some policymakers at least, been dismissed as alarmist or, worse, irrelevant. Popular works that stress this theme, such as Nevil Shute's On the Beach, and Jonathan Schell's The Fate of the Earth, have been labeled disreputable. The apocalyptic claims are rejected as unproved and unlikely, and it is judged unwise to frighten the public with doomsday talk when nuclear weapons are needed, we are told, to preserve the peace. But, as the above quotations illustrate, comparably dire warnings have been made by respectable scientists with diverse political inclinations, including many of the American and Soviet physicists who conceived, devised and constructed the world nuclear arsenals.

Part of the resistance to serious consideration of such apocalyptic pronouncements is their necessarily theoretical basis. Understanding the long-term consequences of nuclear war is not a problem amenable to experimental verification—at least not more than once. Another part of the resistance is psychological. Most people—recognizing nuclear war as a grave and terrifying prospect, and nuclear policy as immersed in technical complexities, official secrecy and bureaucratic inertia—tend to practice what psychiatrists call denial: putting the agonizing problem out of our heads, since there seems nothing we can do about it. Even policymakers must feel this temptation from time to time. But for policymakers there is another concern: if it turns out that nuclear war could end our civilization or our species, such a finding might be considered a retroactive rebuke to those responsible, actively or passively, in the past or in the present, for the global nuclear arms race.

The stakes are too high for us to permit any such factors to influence our assessment of the consequences of nuclear war. If nuclear war now seems significantly more catastrophic than has generally been believed in the military and policy communities, then serious consideration of the resulting implications is urgently called for.

It is in that spirit that this article seeks, first, to present a short summary, in lay terms, of the climatic and biological consequences of nuclear war that emerge from extensive scientific studies conducted over the past two years, the essential conclusions of which have now been endorsed by a large number of scientists. These findings were presented in detail at a special conference in Cambridge, Mass., involving almost 100 scientists on April 22–26, 1983, and were publicly announced at a conference in Washington, D.C., on October 31 and November 1, 1983. They have been reported in summary form in the press, and a detailed statement of the findings and their bases will be published in Science.[1] The present summary is designed particularly for the lay reader.

Following this summary, I explore the possible strategic and policy implications of the new findings.[1] They point to one apparently inescapable conclusion: the necessity of moving as rapidly as possible to reduce the global nuclear arsenals below levels that could conceivably cause the kind of climatic catastrophe and cascading biological devastation predicted by the new studies. Such a reduction would have to be a small percentage of the present global strategic arsenals.

II

The central point of the new findings is that the long-term consequences of a nuclear war could constitute a global climatic catastrophe.

The immediate consequences of a single thermonuclear weapon explosion are well known and well documented—fireball radiation, prompt neutrons and gamma rays, blast, and fires.[2] The Hiroshima bomb that killed between 100,000 and 200,000 people was a fission device of about 12 kilotons yield (the explosive equivalent of 12,000 tons of TNT). A modern thermonuclear warhead uses a device something like the Hiroshima bomb as the trigger—the "match" to light the fusion reaction. A typical thermonuclear weapon now has a yield of about 500 kilotons (or 0.5 megatons, a megaton being the explosive equivalent of a million tons of TNT). There are many weapons in the 9 to 20 megaton range in the strategic arsenals of the United States and the Soviet Union today. The highest-yield weapon ever exploded is 58 megatons.

Footnotes at end of article.

Strategic nuclear weapons are those designed for delivery by ground-based or submarine-launched missiles, or by bombers, to targets in the adversary's homeland. Many weapons with yields roughly equal to that of the Hiroshima bomb are today assigned to "tactical" or "theater" military missions, or are designated "munitions" and relegated to ground-to-air and air-to-air missiles, torpedoes, depth charges and artillery. While strategic weapons often have higher yields than tactical weapons, this is not always the case.[3] Modern tactical or theater missiles (e.g., Pershing II, SS-20) and air support weapons (e.g., those carried by F-15 or MiG-23 aircraft) have sufficient range to make the distinction between "strategic" and "tactical" or "theater" weapons increasingly artificial. Both categories of weapons can be delivered by land-based missiles, sea-based missiles, and aircraft; and by intermediate-range as well as intercontinental delivery systems. Nevertheless, by the usual accounting, there are around 18,000 strategic thermonuclear weapons (warheads) and the equivalent number of fission triggers in the American and Soviet strategic arsenals, with an aggregate yield of about 10,000 megatons.

The total number of nuclear weapons (strategic plus theater and tactical) in the arsenals of the two nations is close to 50,000, with an aggregate yield near 15,000 megatons. For convenience, we here collapse the distinction between strategic and theater weapons, and adopt, under the rubric "strategic," an aggregate yield of 13,000 megatons. The nuclear weapons of the rest of the world—mainly Britain, France and China—amount to many hundred warheads and a few hundred megatons of additional aggregate yield.

No one knows, of course, how many warheads with what aggregate yield would be detonated in a nuclear war. Because of attacks on strategic aircraft and missiles, and because of technological failures, it is clear that less than the entire world arsenal would be detonated. On the other hand, it is generally accepted, even among most military planners, that a "small" nuclear war would be almost impossible to contain before it escalated to include much of the world arsenals.[4] (Precipitating factors include command and control malfunctions, communications failures, the necessity for instantaneous decisions on the fates of millions, fear, panic and other aspects of real nuclear war fought by real people.) For this reason alone, any serious attempt to examine the possible consequences of nuclear war must place major emphasis on large-scale exchanges in the five-to-seven-thousand-megaton range, and many studies have done so.[5] Many of the effects described below, however, can be triggered by much smaller wars.

The adversary's strategic airfields, missile silos, naval bases, submarines at sea, weapons manufacturing and storage locales, civilian and military command and control centers, attack assessment and early warning facilities, and the like are probable targets ("counterforce attack"). While it is often stated that cities are not targeted "per se," many of the above targets are very near or colocated with cities, especially in Europe. In addition, there is an industrial targeting category ("countervalue attack"). Modern nuclear doctrines require that "war-supporting" facilities be attacked. Many of these facilities are necessarily industrial in nature and engage a work force of considerable size. They are almost always situated near major transportation centers, so that raw materials and finished products can be efficiently transported to other industrial sectors, or to forces in the field. Thus, such facilities are, almost by definition, cities, or near or within cities. Other "war-supporting" targets may include the transportation systems themselves (roads, canals, rivers, railways, civilian airfields, etc.), petroleum refineries, storage sites and pipelines, hydroelectric plants, radio and television transmitters and the like. A major countervalue attack therefore might involve almost all large cities in the United States and the Soviet Union, and possibly most of the large cities in the Northern Hemisphere.[6] There are fewer than 2,500 cities in the world with populations over 100,000 inhabitants, so the devastation of all such cities is well within the means of the world nuclear arsenals.

Recent estimates of the immediate deaths from blast, prompt radiation, and fires in a major exchange in which cities were targeted range from several hundred million to 1.1 billion people—the latter estimate is in a World Health Organization study in which targets were assumed not to be restricted entirely to NATO and Warsaw Pact countries.[7] Serious injuries requiring immediate medical attention (which would be largely unavailable) would be suffered by a comparably large number of people, perhaps an additional 1.1 billion.[8] Thus it is possible that something approaching half the human population on the planet would be killed or seriously injured by the direct effects of the nuclear war. Social disruption; the unavailability of electricity, fuel, transportation, food deliveries, communications and other civil services; the absence of medical care; the decline in sanitation measures; rampant disease and severe psychiatric disorders would doubtless collectively claim a significant number of further victims. But a range of additional effects—some unexpected, some inadequately treated in earlier studies, some uncovered only recently—now make the picture much more somber still.

Because of current limitations on missile accuracy, the destruction of missile silos, command and control facilities, and other hardened sites requires nuclear weapons of fairly high yield exploded as groundbursts or as low airbursts. High-yield groundbursts will vaporize, melt and pulverize the surface at the target area and propel large quantities of condensates and fine dust into the upper troposphere and stratosphere. The particles are chiefly entrained in the rising fireball; some ride up the stem of the mushroom cloud. Most military targets, however, are not very hard. The destruction of cities can be accomplished, as demonstrated at Hiroshima and Nagasaki, by lower-yield explosions less than a kilometer above the surface. Low-yield airbursts over cities or near forests will tend to produce massive fires, some of them over areas of 100,000 square kilometers or more. City fires generate enormous quantities of black oily smoke which rise at least into the upper part of the lower atmosphere, or troposphere. If firestorms occur, the smoke column rises vigorously, like the draft in a fireplace, and may carry some of the soot into the lower part of the upper atmosphere, or stratosphere. The smoke from forest and grassland fires would initially be restricted to the lower troposphere.

The fission of the (generally plutonium) trigger in every thermonuclear weapon and the reactions in the (generally uranium-238) casing added as a fission yield "booster" produce a witch's brew of radioactive products, which are also entrained in the cloud. Each such product, or radioisotope, has a characteristic "half-life" (defined as the time to decay to half its original level of radioactivity). Most of the radioisotopes have very short half-lives and decay in hours to days. Particles injected into the stratosphere, mainly by high-yield explosions, fall out very slowly—characteristically in about a year, by which time most of the fission products, even when concentrated, will have decayed to much safer levels. Particles injected into the troposphere by low-yield explosions and fires fall out more rapidly—by gravitational settling, rainout, convection, and other processes—before the radioactivity has decayed to moderately safe levels. Thus rapid fallout of tropospheric radioactive debris tends to produce larger doses of ionizing radiation than does the slower fallout of radioactive particles from the stratosphere.

Nuclear explosions of more than one-megaton yield generate a radiant fireball that rises through the troposphere into the stratosphere. The fireballs from weapons with yields between 100 kilotons and one megaton will partially extend into the stratosphere. The high temperatures in the fireball chemically ignite some of the mitrogen in the air, producing oxides of nitrogen, which in turn chemically attack and destroy the gas ozone in the middle stratosphere. But ozone absorbs the biologically dangerous ultraviolet radiation from the Sun. Thus the partial depletion of the stratospheric ozone layer, or "ozonosphere," by high-yield nuclear explosions will increase the flux of solar ultraviolet radiation at the surface of the Earth (after the soot and dust have settled out). After a nuclear war in which thousands of high-yield weapons are detonated, the increase in biologically dangerous ultraviolet light might be several hundred percent. In the more dangerous shorter wave-lengths, larger increases would occur. Nucleic acids and proteins, the fundamental molecules for life on Earth, are especially sensitive to ultraviolet radiation. Thus, an increase of the solar ultraviolet flux at the surface of the Earth is potentially dangerous for life.

These four effects—obscuring smoke in the troposphere, obscuring dust in the stratosphere, the fallout of radioactive debris, and the partial destruction of the ozone layer—constitute the four know principal adverse environmental consequences that occur after a nuclear war is "over." There may be others about which we are still ignorant. The dust and, especially, the dark soot absorb ordinary visible light from the Sun, heating the atmosphere and cooling the Earth's surface.

All four of these effects have been treated in our recent scientific investigation.[9] The study, known from the initials of its authors as TTAPS, for the first time demonstrates that severe and prolonged low temperatures would follow a nuclear war. (The study also explains the fact that no such climatic effects were detected after the detonation of hunderds of megatons during the period U.S.-Soviet atmospheric testing of nuclear weapons, ended by treaty in 1963: the explosions were sequential over many years, not virtually simultaneous; and occurring over scrub desert, coral atolls, tundra and wasteland, they set no fires.) The new results have been subjected to detailed scrutiny, and half a dozen confirmatory calculations have now been made. A special panel appointed by the National Academy of Sciences to examine this problem has come to similar conclusions.[10]

Unlike many previous studies, the effects do not seem to be restricted to northern mid-latitudes, where the nuclear exchange would mainly take place. There is now substantial evidence that the heating by sunlight of atmospheric dust and soot over northern mid-latitude targets would profoundly change the global circulation. Fine particles would be transported across the equator in weeks, bringing the cold and the dark to the Southern Hemisphere. (In addition, some studies suggest that over 100 megatons would be dedicated to equatorial and Southern Hemisphere targets, thus generating fine particles locally.)[11] While it would be less cold and less dark at the ground in the Southern Hemisphere than in the Northern, massive climatic and environmental disruptions may be triggered there as well.

In our studies, several dozen different scenarios were chosen, covering a wide range of possible wars, and the range of uncertainty in each key parameter was considered (e.g., to describe how many fine particles are injected into the atmosphere). Five representative cases are shown in Table 1, below, ranging from a small low-yield attack exclusively on cities, utilizing, in yield, only 0.8 percent of the world strategic arsenals, to a massive exchange involving 75 percent of the world arsenals. "Nominal" cases assume the most probable parameter choices; "severe" cases assume more adverse parameter choices, but still in the plausible range.

TABLE 1.—NUCLEAR EXCHANGE SCENARIOS

Case	Total yield (MT)	Percent yield surface bursts	Percent yield urban or industrial targets	Warhead yield range (MT)	Total number of explosions
1. Baseline Case, countervalue and counterforce [1]	5,000	57	20	0.1–10	10,400
11. 3,000 MT nominal, counterforce only [2]	3,000	50	0	1–10	2,250
14. 100 MT nominal countervalue only [3]	100	0	100	.1	1,000
16. 5000 MT "severe," counterforce only [2 4]	5,000	100	0	5–10	700
17. 10,000 MT "severe," countervalue and counterforce [3 4]	10,000	63	15	.1–10	16,160

[1] In the Baseline Case, 12,000 square kilometers of inner cities are burned; on every square centimeter an average of 10 grams of combustibles are burned, and 1.1% of the burned material rises as smoke. Also, 230,000 square kilometers of suburban area burn, with 1.5 grams consumed at each square centimeter and 3.6% rising as smoke.

[2] In this highly conservative case, it is assumed that no smoke emission occurs, that not a blade of grass is burned. Only 25,000 tons of the fine dust is raised into the upper atmosphere for every megaton exploded.

[3] In contrast to the Baseline Case, only inner cities burn, but with 10 grams per square centimeter consumed and 3.3% rising as smoke into the high atmosphere.

[4] Here, the fine (submicron) dust raised into the upper atmosphere is 150,000 tons per megaton exploded.

Predicted continental temperatures in the Northern Hemisphere vary after the nuclear war according to the curves shown in Figure 1 on the following page. The high heat-retention capacity of water guarantees that oceanic temperatures will fall at most by a few degrees. Because temperatures are moderated by the adjacent oceans, temperature effects in coastal regions will be less extreme than in continental interiors. The temperatures shown in Figure 1 are average values for Northern Hemisphere land areas.

Even much smaller temperature declines are known to have serious consequences. The explosion of the Tambora volcano in Indonesia in 1815 led to an average global temperature decline of only 1°C, due to the obscuration of sunlight by the fine dust propelled into the stratosphere; yet the hard freezes the following year were so severe that 1816 has been known in Europe and America as "the year without a summer." A 1°C cooling would nearly eliminate wheat growing in Canada.[12] In the last thousand years, the maximum global or Northern Hemisphere temperature deviations have been around 1°C. In an Ice Age, a typical long-term temperature decline from preexisting conditions is about 10°C. Even the most modest of the cases illustrated in Figure 1 give temporary temperature declines of this order. The Baseline Case is much more adverse. Unlike the situation in an Ice Age, however, the global temperatures after nuclear war plunge rapidly and take only months to a few years to recover, rather than thousands of years. No new Ice Age is likely to be induced by a Nuclear Winter.

Because of the obscuration of the Sun, the daytime light levels can fall to a twilit gloom or worse. For more than a week in the northern mid-latitude target zone, it might be much too dark to see, even at midday. In Cases 1 and 14 (Table 1), hemispherically averaged light levels fall to a few percent of normal values, comparable to those at the bottom of a dense overcast. At this illumination, many plants are close to what is called the compensation point, the light level at which photosynthesis can barely keep pace with plant metabolism. In Case 17, illumination, averaged over the entire Northern Hemisphere, falls in daytime to about 0.1 percent of normal, a light level at which plants will not photosynthesize at all. For Cases 1 and especially 17, full recovery to ordinary daylight takes a year or more (Figure 1).

As the fine particles fall out of the atmosphere, carrying radioactivity to the ground, the light levels increase and the surface warms. The depleted ozone layer now permits ultraviolet light to reach the Earth's surface in increased proportions. The relative timing of the multitude of adverse consequences of a nuclear war is shown in Table 2, on the following page.

Perhaps the most striking and unexpected consequence of our study is that even a comparatively small nuclear war can have devastating climatic consequences, provided cities are targeted (see Case 14 in Figure 1; here, the centers of 100 major NATO and Warsaw Pact cities are burning). There is an indication of a very rough threshold at which severe climatic consequences are triggered—around a few hundred nuclear explosions over cities, for smoke generation, or around 2,000 to 3,000 high-yield surface bursts at, e.g., missile silos, for dust generation and ancillary fires. Fine particles can be injected into the atmosphere at increasing rates with only minor effects until these thresholds are crossed. Thereafter, the effects rapidly increase in severity.[13]

As in all calculations of this complexity, there are uncertainties. Some factors tend to work towards more severe or more prolonged effects; others tend to ameliorate the effects.[14] The detailed TTAPS calculations described here are one-dimensional; that is, they assume the fine particles to move vertically by all the appropriate laws of physics, but neglect the spreading in latitude and longitude. When soot or dust is moved away from the reference locale, things get better there and worse elsewhere. In addition, fine particles can be transported by weather systems to other locales, where they are carried more rapidly down to the surface. That would ameliorate obscuration not just locally but globally. It is just this transport away from the northern mid-latitudes that involves the equatorial zone and the Southern Hemisphere in the effects of the nuclear war. It would be helpful to perform an accurate three-dimensional calculation on the general atmospheric circulation following a nuclear war. Preliminary estimates suggest that circulation might moderate the low temperatures in the Northern Hemisphere predicted in our calculations by some 30 percent, lessening somewhat the severity of the effects, but still leaving them at catastrophic levels (e.g., a 30°C rather than a 40°C temperature drop). To provide a small margin of safety, we neglect this correction in our subsequent discussion.

There are also effects that tend to make the results much worse: for example, in our calculations we assumed that rainout of fine particles occurred through the entire troposphere. But under realistic circumstances, at least the upper troposphere may be very dry, and any dust or soot carried there initially may take much longer to fall out. There is also a very significant effect deriving from the drastically altered structure of the atmosphere, brought about by the heating of the clouds and the cooling of the surface. This produces a region in which the temperature is approximately constant with altitude in the lower atmosphere and topped by a massive temperature inversion. Particles throughout the atmosphere would then be transported vertically very slowly—as in the present stratosphere. This is a second reason why the lifetime of the clouds of soot and dust may be much longer than we have calculated. If so, the worst of the cold and the dark might be prolonged for considerable periods of time, conceivably for more than a year. We also neglect this effect in subsequent discussion.

Nuclear war scenarios are possible that are much worse than the ones we have presented. For example, if command and control capabilities are lost early in the war—by, say, "decapitation" (an early surprise attack on civilian and military headquarters and communications facilities)—then the war conceivably could be extended for weeks as local commanders make separate and uncoordinated decisions. At least some of the delayed missile launches could be retaliatory strikes against any remaining adversary cities. Generation of an additional smoke pall over a period of weeks or longer following the initiation of the war would extend the magnitude, but especially the duration of the climatic consequences. Or it is possible that more cities and forests would be ignited than we have assumed, or that smoke emissions would be larger, or that a greater fraction of the world arsenals would be committed. Less severe cases are of course possible as well.

These calculations therefore are not, and cannot be, assured prognostications of the full consequences of a nuclear war. Many refinements in them are possible and are being pursued. But there is general agreement on the overall conclusions: in the wake of a nuclear war there is likely to be a period, lasting at least for months, of extreme cold in a radioactive gloom, followed—after the soot and dust fallout—by an extended period of increased ultraviolet light reaching the surface.[15]

We now explore the biological impact of such an assault on the global environment.

III

The immediate human consequences of nuclear explosions range from vaporization of populations near the hypocenter, to blast-generated trauma (from flying glass, falling beams, collapsing skyscrapers and the like), to burns, radiation sickness, shock and severe psychiatric disorders. But our concern here is with longer-term effects.

It is now a commonplace that in the burning of modern tall buildings, more people succumb to toxic gases than to fire. Ignition of many varieties of building materials, insulation and fabrics generates large amounts of such pyrotoxins, including carbon monoxide, cyanides, vinyl chlorides, oxides of nitrogen, ozone, dioxins, and furans. Because of differing practices in the use of such synthetics, the burning of cities in North America and Western Europe will probably generate more pyrotoxins than cities in the Soviet Union, and cities with substantial recent construction more than older, unreconstructed cities. In nuclear war scenarios in which a great many cities are burning, a significant pyrotoxin smog might persist for months. the magnitude of this danger is unknown.

The pyrotoxins, low light levels, radioactive fallout, subsequent ultraviolet light, and especially the cold are together likely to destroy almost all of Northern Hemisphere agriculture, even for the more modest Cases 11 and 14. A 12° to 15°C temperature reduction by itself would eliminate wheat and corn production in the United States, even if all civil systems and agricultural technology were intact.[16] With unavoidable societal disruption, and with the other environmental stresses just mentioned, even a 3,000-megaton "pure" counterforce attack (Case 11) might suffice. realistically, many fires would be set even in such an attack (see below), and a 3,000-megaton war is likely to wipe out U.S. grain production. This would represent by itself and unprecedented global catastrophe: North American grain is the principal reliable source of export food on the planet, as well as an essential component of U.S. prosperity. Wars just before harvesting of grain and other staples would be incrementally worse than wars after harvesting. For many scenarios, the effects will extend (see Figure 2) into two or more growing seasons. Widespread fires and subsequent runoff of topsoil are among the many additional deleterious consequences extending for years after the war.

Something like three-quarters of the U.S. population lives in or near cities. In the cities themselves there is, on average, only about one week's supply of food. After a nuclear war it is conceivable that enough of present grain storage might survive to maintain, on some level, the present population for more than a year. But with the breakdown of civil order and transportation systems in the cold, the dark and the fallout, these stores would become largely inaccessible. Vast numbers of survivors would soon starve to death.

In addition, the sub-freezing temperatures imply, in many cases, the unavailability of fresh water. The ground will tend to be frozen to a depth of about a meter—incidentally making it unlikely that the hundreds of millions of dead bodies would be buried, even if the civil organization to do so existed. Fuel stores to melt snow and ice would be in short supply, and ice surfaces and freshly fallen snow would tend to be contaminated by radioactivity and pyrotoxins.

In the presence of excellent medical care, the average value of the acute lethal dose of ionizing radiation for healthy adults is about 450 rads. (As with many other effects, children, the infirm and the elderly tend to be more vulnerable.) Combined with the other assaults on survivors in the postwar environment, and in the probable absence of any significant medical care, the mean lethal acute dose is likely to decline to 350 rads or even lower. For many outdoor scenarios, doses within the fallout plumes that drift hundreds of kilometers downwind of targets are greater than the mean lethal dose. (For a 10,000-megaton war, this is true for more than 30 percent of northern mid-latitude land areas.) Far from targets, intermediate-timescale chronic doses from delayed radio-active fallout may be in excess of 100 rads for the baseline case. These calculations assume no detonations on nuclear reactors or fuel-reprocessing plants, which would increase the dose.

Thus, the combination of acute doses from prompt radioactive fallout, chronic doses from the delayed intermediate-timescale fallout, and internal doses from food and drink are together likely to kill many more by radiation sickness. Because of acute damage to bone marrow, survivors would have significantly increased vulnerability to infectious diseases. Most infants exposed to 100 rads as fetuses in the first two trimesters of pregnancy would suffer mental retardation and/or other serious birth defects. Radiation and some pyrotoxins would later produce neoplastic diseases and genetic damage. Livestock and domesticated animals, with fewer resources, vanishing food supplies and in many cases with greater sensitivity to the stresses of nuclear war than human beings, would also perish in large numbers.

These devastating consequences for humans and for agriculture would not be restricted to the locales in which the war would principally be "fought," but would extend throughout northern mid-latitudes and, with reduced but still significant severity, probably to the tropics and the Southern Hemisphere. The bulk of the world's grain exports originate in northern mid-latitudes. Many nations in the developing as well as the developed world depend on the import of food. Japan, for example, imports 75 percent of its food (and 99 percent of its fuel). Thus, even if there were no climatic and radiation stresses on tropical and Southern Hemisphere societies—many of them already at subsistence levels of nutrition—large numbers of people there would die of starvation.

As agriculture breaks down worldwide (possible initial exceptions might include Argentina, Australia and South Africa if the climatic impact on the Southern Hemisphere proved to be minimal), there will be increasing reliance on natural ecosystems—fruits, tubers, roots, nuts, etc. But wild foodstuffs will also have suffered from the effects of the war. At just the moment that surviving humans turn to the natural environment for the basis of life, that environment would be experiencing a devastation unprecedented in recent geological history.

Two-thirds of all species of plants, animals, and microorganisms on the Earth live within 25° of the equator. Because temperatures tend to vary with the seasons only minimally at tropical latitudes, species there are especially vulnerable to rapid temperature declines. In past major extinction events in the paleontological record, there has been a marked tendency for tropical organisms to show greater vulnerability than organisms living at more temperate latitudes.

The darkness alone may cause a collapse in the aquatic food chain in which sunlight is harvested by phytoplankton, phytoplankton by zooplankton, zooplankton by small fish, small fish by large fish, and occasionally, large fish by humans. In many nuclear war scenarios, this food chain is likely to collapse at its base for at least a year and is significantly more imperiled in tropical waters. The increase in ultraviolet light available at the surface of the earth approximately a year after the war provides an additional major environmental stress that by itself has been described as having "profound consequences" for aquatic, terrestrial and other ecosystems.[17]

The global ecosystem can be considered an intricately woven fabric composed of threads contributed by the millions of separate species that inhabit the planet and interact with the air, the water and the soil. The system has developed considerable resiliency, so that pulling a single thread is unlikely to unravel the entire fabric. Thus, most ordinary assaults on the biosphere are unlikely to have catastrophic consequences. For example, because of natural small changes in stratospheric ozone abundance, organisms have probably experienced, in the fairly recent geologic past, ten percent fluctuations in the solar near-ultraviolet flux (but not fluctuations by factors of two or more). Similarly, major continental temperature changes of the magnitude and extent addressed here may not have been experienced for tens of thousands and possibly not for millions of years. We have no experimental information, even for aquaria or terraria, on the simultaneous effects of cold, dark, pyrotoxins, ionizing radiation, and ultraviolet light as predicted in the TTAPS study.

Each of these factors, taken separately, may carry serious consequences for the global ecosystem: their interactions may be much more dire still. Extremely worrisome is the possibility of poorly understood or as yet entirely uncontemplated synergisms (where the net consequences of two or more assaults on the environment are much more than the sum of the component parts). For example, more than 100 rads (and possibly more than 200 rads) of external and ingested ionizing radiation is likely to be delivered in a very large nuclear war to all plants, animals and unprotected humans in densely populated regions of northern mid-latitudes. After the soot and dust clear, there can, for such wars, be a 200 to 400 percent increment in the solar ultraviolet flux that reaches the ground, with an increase of many orders of magnitude in the more dangerous shorter-wavelength radiation. Together, these radiation assaults are likely to suppress the immune systems of humans and other species, making them more vulnerable to disease. At the same time, the high ambient-radiation fluxes are likely to produce, through mutation, new varieties of microorganisms, some of which might become pathogenic. The preferential radiation sensitivity of birds and other insect predators would enhance the proliferation of herbivorous and pathogen-carrying insects. Carried by vectors with high radiation tolerance, it seems possible that epidemics and global pandemics would propogate with no hope of effective mitigation by medical care, even with reduced population sizes and greatly restricted human mobility. Plants, weakened by low temperatures and low light levels, and other animals would likewise be vulnerable to preexisting and newly arisen pathogens.

There are many other conceivable synergisms, all of them still poorly understood because of the complexity of the global ecosystem. Every synergism represents an additional assault, of unknown magnitude, on the global ecosystem and its support functions for humans. What the world would look like after a nuclear war depends in part upon the unknown synergistic interaction of these various adverse effects.

We do not and cannot know that the worst would happen after a nuclear war. Perhaps there is some as yet undiscovered compensating effect or saving grace—although in the past, the overlooked effects in studies of nuclear war have almost always tended toward the worst. But in an uncertain matter of such gravity, it is wise to contemplate the worst, especially when its probability is not extremely small. The summary of the findings of the group of 40 distinguished biologists who met in April 1983 to assess to TTAPS conclusions is worthy of careful consideration.[18]

Species extinction could be expected for most tropical plants and animals, and for most terestrial vertebrates of north temperate regions, a large number of plants, and numerous freshwater and some marine organisms. . . . Whether any people would be able to persist for long in the face of highly modified biological communities; novel climates; high levels of radiation; shattered agricultural, social, and economic systems; extraordinary psychological stresses; and a host of other difficulties is open to question. It is clear that the ecosystem effects alone resulting from a large-scale thermonuclear war could be enough to destroy the current civilization in at least the Northern Hemisphere. Coupled with the direct casualties of perhaps two billion people, the combined intermediate and long-term effects of nuclear war sugget that eventually there might be no human survivors in the Northern Hemisphere.

Furthermore, the scenario described here is by no means the most severe that could be imagined with present world nuclear arsenals and those contemplated for the near future. In almost any realistic case involving nuclear exchanges between the superpowers, global environmental changes sufficient to cause an extinction even equal to or more severe than that at the close of the Cretaceous when the dinsosaurs and many other species died out are likely. In that event, the possibility of the extinction of Homo sapiens cannot be excluded.

The foregoing probable consequences of various nuclear war scenarios have implications for doctrine and policy. Some have argued that the difference between the deaths of several hundred million people in a nuclear war (as has been thought until recently to be a reasonable upper limit) and the death of every person on Earth (as now seems possible) is only a matter of one order of magnitude. For me, the difference is considerably greater. Restricting our attention only to those who die as a consequence of the war conceals its full impact.

If we are required to calibrate extinction in numerical terms, I would be sure to include the number of people in future generations who would not be born. A nuclear war imperils all of our descendants, for as long as there will be humans. Even if the population remains static, with an average lifetime of the order of 100 years, over a typical time period for the biological evolution of a successful species (roughly ten million years), we are talking about some 500 trillion people yet to come. By this criterion, the stakes are one million times greater for extinction than for the more modest nuclear wars that kill "only" hundreds of millions of people.

There are many other possible measures of the potential loss—including culture and science, the evolutionary history of the planet, and the significance of the lives of all of our ancestors who contributed to the future of their descendants. Extinction is the undoing of the human enterprise.

For me, the new results on climatic catastrophe raise the stakes of nuclear war enormously. But I recognize that there are those, including some policymakers, who feel that the increased level of fatalities has little impact on policy, but who nevertheless acknowledge that the newly emerging consequences of nuclear war may require changes in specific points of strategic doctrine. I here set down what seem to me some of the more apparent such implications, within the context of present nuclear stockpiles. The idea of a crude threshold, very roughly around 500 to 2,000 warheads, for triggering the climatic catastrophe will be central to some of these considerations. (Such a threshold applies only to something like the present distribution of yields in the strategic arsenals. Drastic conversion to very low-yield arsenals—see below—changes some of the picture dramatically.) I hope others will constructively examine these preliminary thoughts and explore additional implications of the TTAPS results.

1. First Strike. The mirving of missiles (the introduction of multiple warheads), improvements in accuracy, and other developments have increased the perceived temptation to launch a devastating first strike against land targets—even though both sides retain a powerful retaliatory force in airborne bombers and submarines at sea. Much current concern and national rhetoric is addressed to the first-strike capability of extant or proposed weapons systems. The mere capability of a first strike creates incentives for a preemptive attack. Launch-on-warning and simultaneous release of all strategic weapons are two of several ominous and destabilizing innovations contrived in response to the fear of a first strike.

The number of U.S. land-based strategic missiles is about 1,050; for the Soviet Union, about 1,400. In addition, each side has at least several dozen dedicated and alternative strategic bomber bases and airstrips, as well as command and control facilities, submarine ports and other prime strategic targets on land. Each target requires—for high probability of its destruction—two or perhaps three attacking warheads. Thus, a convincing first strike against land targets requires at least 2,200 and perhaps as many as 4,500 attacking warheads. Some—for example, to disable bombers that succeed in becoming airborne just before the first strike—would detonate as airbursts. While many missile silos, especially in the United States, are surrounded by farmland and brush, other strategic targets, especially in Europe and Asia, are sufficiently near forests or urban areas for major conflagrations to be set, even in a "pure" counterforce attack. Accordingly, a major first strike would be clearly in the vicinity of, and perhaps well over, the climatic threshold.

A counterforce first strike is unlikely to be completely effective. Perhaps 10 to 40 percent of the adversary's silos and most of its airborne bombers and submarines at sea will survive, and its response may not be against silos, but against cities. Ten percent of 5,000-warhead strategic arsenal is 500 warheads: distributed over cities, this seems by itself enough to trigger a major climatic catastrophe.

Such a first strike scenario, in which the danger to the aggressor nation depends upon the unpredictable response of the attacked nation, seems risky enough. (The hope for the aggressor nation is that its retained second-strike force, including strategic submarines and unlaunched land-based missiles, will intimidate the adversary into surrender rather than provoke it into retaliation.) But the decision to launch a first strike that is tantamount to national suicide for the aggressor—even if the attacked nation does not lift a finger to retaliate—is a different circumstance altogether. If a first strike gains no more than a pyrrhic victory of ten days' duration before the prevailing winds carry the nuclear winter to the aggressor nation, the "attractiveness" of the first strike would seem to be diminished significantly.

A Doomsday Machine is useless if the potential adversary is ignorant of its presence.[19] But since many distinguished scientists, both American and Soviet, have participated vigorously in recent studies of the climatic consequences of nuclear war, since there appears to be no significant disagreement in the conclusions, and since policymakers will doubtless be apprised of these new results, it would appear that a decision to launch a major first strike is now much less rational, and therefore, perhaps, much less probable. The better political leaders understand the nuclear winter, the more secure are such conclusions.

If true, this should have cascading consequences for specific weapons systems. Further, the perceived vulnerability to a first strike has been a major source of stress and fear, and thereby a major spur to the nuclear arms race. Knowledge that a first strike is now less probable might make at least some small contribution to dissipating the poisonous atmosphere of mistrust that currently characterizes Soviet-American relations.

2. Sub-threshold War. Devastating nuclear wars that are nevertheless significantly below the threshold for severe climatic consequences certainly seem possible—for example, the destruction of 10 or 20 cities, or 100 silos of a particularly destabilizing missile system. Nevertheless, might some nation be tempted to initiate or engage in a much larger, but still reliably sub-threshold nuclear war? The hope might be that the attacked adversary would be reluctant to retaliate for fear of crossing the threshold.

This is not very different from the hope that a counterforce first strike would not be followed by a retaliatory strike, because of the aggressor's retention of an invulnerable (for example, submarine-based) second-strike force adequate to destroy populations and national economies. It suffers the same deficiency—profound uncertainty about the likely response.

The strategic forces of the United States or the Soviet Union—even if they were all at fixed sites—could not be destroyed in a reliably sub-threshold war: there are too many essential targets. Thus, a sub-threshold first strike powerfully provokes the attacked nation and leaves much of its retaliatory force untouched. It is easy to imagine a nation, having contemplated becoming the object of a sub-threshold first strike, planning to respond in kind, because it judges that failure to do so would itself invite attack. Retaliation could occur immediately against a few key cities—if national leaders were restrained and command and control facilities intact—or massively, months later, after much of the dust and smoke have fallen out, extending the duration but ameliorating the severity of the net climatic effects.

This, however, may not be the case for such nations as Britain, France or China. Because of the marked contiguity of strategic targets and urban areas in Europe, the climatic threshold for attacks on European nuclear powers may be significantly less than for the United States or the Soviet Union. Provided it could be accomplished without triggering a U.S.-Soviet nuclear war, first strikes against all the fixed-site strategic forces of one of these nations might not trigger the climatic catastrophe. Nevertheless, the invulnerable retaliatory capability of these nations—especially the ballistic-missile submarines of Britain and France—makes such a first strike unlikely.

3. Treaties on Yields and Targeting. I would not include this possibility, except that it has been mentioned publicly by a leading American nuclear strategist. The proposal has two parts. The first is to ban by treaty all nuclear warheads with yields in excess of 300 or 400 kilotons. The fireballs from warheads of higher yields mainly penetrate into the stratosphere and work to deplete the ozonosphere.

The reconversion of nuclear warheads to lower individual yields would reduce (although not remove) the threat of significantly enhanced ultraviolet radiation at the surface of the Earth, but would in itself have no bearing on the issue of climatic catastrophe, and would increase the intermediate-timescale radioactive fallout. Within the present strategic arsenals, there is no mix of yields that simultaneously minimizes ionizing radiation from fallout and ultraviolet radiation from the Sun.

As delivery system accuracy has progressively improved, there has been a corresponding tendency toward the deployment of lower-yield warheads, although not through any concern about the integrity of the ozonosphere. There is also a trend toward higher fission fractions, implying more radioactive fallout. Limitations on the sizes and therefore, to some extent, on the yields of new warheads are part of recent U.S. arms control proposals. With the bulk of Soviet strategic warheads having yields larger than their U.S. counterparts, however, treaties limiting high yields place greater demands on Soviet than on U.S. compliance. Moreover, to enforce a categorical yield ceiling seems to imply verification problems of some difficulty.

The second part of the proposal is to guarantee by treaty that cities would not be targeted. Then the worst of the climatic effects might be avoided, although the climatic consequences of "pure" counterforce exchanges can still be extremely serious (Figure 1). The encoding of targeting coordinates, however, is in principle done remotely, and involves different coordinates for each warhead. Even if we could imagine international inspection teams descending unannounced on Soviet or American missile silos to inspect the targeting coordinated, an hour later the coordinates could be returned to those appropriate for cities.

Targeting policy is among the most sensitive aspects of nuclear strategy, and maintaining uncertainty about targeting policy is thought to be an essential component of U.S. deterrence. The proposal is unlikely to be received warmly by the U.S. Joint Strategic Targeting Staff or its Soviet counterpart. It is also difficult to understand how those skeptical of the verifiability by reconnaissance satellites of SALT II provisions on the deployment of missiles ten meters long can rest easy about verification of treaties controlling what is encoded in a microchip one millimeter long. Nevertheless, a symbolic, unverifiable targeting treaty, entered into because both sides recognize that it is not in their interest to target cities, might have some merit.

4. Transition to Low-Yield High-Accuracy Arsenals. A conceivable response to the prospect of climatic catastrophe might be to continue present trends toward lower-yield and higher-accuracy missiles, perhaps accompanied by development of the technology for warheads to burrow sub-surface before detonating. Payloads have been developed for the Pershing II missile that use radar area-correlators for target recognition and terminal guidance; the targeting probable error is said to be 40 meters.[20] It is evident that a technology is gradually emerging that could permit delivery accuracies of 35 meters or better over intercontinental ranges.

It is evident as well that burrowing technology is also under rapid development.[21] A one-kiloton burst, two to three meters subsurface, will excavate a crater roughly 60 meters across.[22] Clearly, high-accuracy penetrating warheads in the one-to-ten-kiloton range would be able, with high reliability, to destroy even very hardened silos and underground command posts.

Low-yield sub-surface explosions of this sort cannot threaten the ozonosphere. They minimize fires, soot, stratospheric dust and radioactive fallout. Even several thousand simultaneous such detonations, might not trigger the nuclear winter. Similar technology might be used for pinpoint attacks on military/industrial targets in urban areas. Thus, the TTAPS results will probably lead to calls for further improvements in high-accuracy earth-burrowing warheads.

There are, I think, a number of difficulties with this proposal, as attractive as it seems in a strictly military context. A world in which the nuclear arsenals were completely converted to a relatively small number of burrowing low-yield warheads would be much safer in terms of the climatic catastrophe. But such warheads are provocative. They are the perfect post-TTAPS first-strike weapon. Their development might well be taken as a serious interest in making a climatically safe but disabling first strike. Greatly expanded deployment of anti-ballistic missiles might be one consequence of their buildup.

Retaliation from surviving silos, aircraft and especially submarines, as discussed above, is likely, whatever the disposition of yields in a first strike. Also, arsenals cannot be converted instantaneously. There would be a very dangerous and protracted transition period in which enough newer weapons are deployed to be destabilizing, and enough older weapons are still in place to trigger the nuclear winter.

However, if the inventories of modern higher-yield (more than ten kiloton) warheads were first brought below threshold, a coordinated U.S.-Soviet deployment of low-yield burrowers might be accomplished in somewhat greater safety. On many launchers, each with a single warhead, they might provide a useful reassurance to defense ministries at some points in the transition process. At any rate, the dramatic reduction of arsenals necessary to go below threshold before larger-scale burrower deployment is indistinguishable from major arms reduction for its own sake see (see below).

5. Consequences for the Developing World. Before the TTAPS calculations were performed, it was possible to argue that the developing world would be severely affected by secondary economic consequences, but not fundamentally destroyed by a northern midlatitude nuclear war. Now it seems more likely that nations having no part in the conflict—even nations entirely neutral in the global confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union—might be reduced to prehistoric population levels and economies, or worse. Nations between 70°N and 30°S, nations with marginal economies, nations with large food imports or extensive malnutrition today, and nations with their own strategic targets are particularly at risk.

Thus, the very survival of nations distant from any likely nuclear conflict can now be seen to depend on the prudence and wisdom of the major nuclear powers. India, Brazil, Nigeria or Saudi Arabia could collapse in a nuclear war without a single bomb being dropped on their territories.[23]

Quite apart from any concern about the deflection of world financial, technical and intellectual resources to the nuclear arms race, the prospect of nuclear war now clearly and visibly threatens every nation and every person on the planet. The diplomatic and economic pressure accordingly placed on the five nuclear powers by the other nations of the world, concerned about their own survival, could be at least marginally significant.

6. Shelters. The usual sorts of shelters envisioned for civilian populations are ineffective even for the nuclear war consequences known before the TTAPS study. The more ambitious among them include food and water for a week or two, modest heating capabilities, rudimentary sanitary and air filtration facilities and no provisions for the psychological burdens of an extended stay below ground with unknown climatic and ecological consequences propagating overhead. The kinds of shelters suitable for prolonged subfreezing temperatures, high radiation doses, and pyrotoxins would have to be very much more elaborate—quite apart from the question of what good it would be to emerge six or nine months later to an ultraviolet-bathed and biological depauperate surface, with insect pests proliferating, disease rampant, and the basis of agriculture destroyed.

Appropriate shelters, able to service individual families or family groups for months to a year, are too expensive for most families even in the affluent West. The construction of major government shelters for civilian populations would be enormously expensive as well as in itself potentially destabilizing. The prospect of the climatic catastrophe also heightens the perceived inequity between government leaders and (in some cases) their families, provided elaborate shelters, and the bulk of the civilian population, unable to afford even a minimally adequate shelter.

But even if it were possible to build perfectly effective shelters for the entire populations of the United States and the Soviet Union, this would in no way address the danger to which the rest of the world would be put. Shelters for the combatant nations under circumstances in which only their citizens are threatened are one thing. Shelters for the combatant nations when gravely threatened noncombatant nations have only rudimentary or nonexistent shelters are a very different matter.

7. Ballistic-Missile Defense Systems. It might be argued that the prospect of a climatic catastrophe strengthens whatever arguments there may be for ground-based or space-based ballistic missile defense (BMD) systems, as proposed by President Reagan in his March 23, 1983 "Star Wars" speech. There are grave technical, cost and policy difficulties with such proposals.[24] Even advocates do not envision it being fully operational in less than two or three decades.

Optimistic informed estimates of porosity or "penetrance" (the fraction of attacking missiles successfully detonating at their targets despite the BMD) are no lower than 5 to 30 percent. The present world arsenal of strategic warheads is so much greater than the threshold for climatic catastrophe that, even if 5 to 30 percent of attacking missiles get through in something like a full exchange, the catastrophe could be triggered. And most competent estimates put the porosity—at least for the foreseeable future—at 50 percent to 99 percent. Further, one likely response to an adversary's anticipated deployment of BMD systems would be a proportionate increase in the stockpiles of offensive warheads in compensation.

There are three phases in the trajectories of incoming missiles when they might be attacked: boost phase, midcourse phase, and terminal phase. Boost-phase and midcourse interception would, at best, require an untried technology deployed at scales never before attempted. Only terminal-phase BMDs exist at the present time (antiballistic missiles or ABMs), and even they, ineffective as they are, may require ruinous capital investments before they can provide meaningful levels of defense. Developments in terminal-phase maneuverability of attacking warheads are likely to raise the price tag of an effective BMD sharply again. Even in the best of circumstances, offense will be more effective and less costly than defense.

Finally, terminal-phase interception, generally effective only for hard-target defense, is characteristically designed to occur at very low altitudes. There would be an advantage to the offense if it fused the incoming missiles so they would explode if attacked ("sympathetic detonation"). In some schemes, the BMD itself involves nuclear warheads exploded near the ground. A fair fraction of hard targets especially in Europe and the Soviet Union, are within a few tens of kilometers of cities or forests. Thus, the most readily deployable BMD suffers the disability, when it works at all, of generating fires contributory to a climatic catastrophe, quite apart from its porosity.

8. Other Possibilities. There are a number or other conceivable responses to the climatic catastrophe, some even more desperate than those discussed above. For example, a nation might relocate its silos and mobile launchers (the latter inviting barrage attack) to cities and forests to guarantee that a barely adequate counterforce first strike by its adversary would trigger a global climatic catastrophe with high confidence. Or nations with small nuclear arsenals or marginal strategic capability might contemplate amassing a threshold arsenal of some 500 to 2,000 deliverable warheads in order to be taken seriously in "great power" politics.

But these and similar contrivances increase the probability of nuclear war or the dangers attendant to nuclear war sufficiently that they are likely to be rejected by the nation contemplating such moves or, failing that, by other nations. Major relocations of strategic weapons systems or the deployment of new strategic arsenals are readily detectable by national technical means.

V

None of the foregoing possible strategic and policy responses to the prospect of a nuclear war-triggered climatic castastrophe seem adequate even for the security of the nuclear powers, much less for the rest of the world. The prospect reinforces, in the short run, the standard arguments for strategic confidence-building, especially between the United States and the Soviet Union; for tempering puerile rhetoric; for resisting the temptation to demonize the adversary; for reducing the likelihood of strategic confrontations arising from accident or miscalculation; for stabilizing old and new weapons systems—for example, by de-MIRVing missiles; for abandoning nuclear-war-fighting strategies and mistrusting the possiblity of "containment" of a tactical or limited nuclear war; for considering safe unilateral steps, such as the retiring of some old weapons systems with very high-yield warheads; for improving communications at all levels, especially among general staffs and between heads of governments; and for public declarations of relevant policy changes. The United States might also contemplate ratification of SALT II and of the 1948 U.N. Convention of the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (ratified by 92 nations, including the Soviet Union).

Both nations might consider abandoning apocalyptic threats and doctrines. To the extent that these are not credible, they undermine deterrence; to the extent that they are credible, they set in motion events that tend toward apocalyptic conclusions.

In the long run, the prospect of climatic catastrophe raises real questions about what is meant by national and international security. To me, it seems clear that the species is in grave danger at least until the world arsenals are reduced below the threshold for climatic catastrophe; the nations and the global civilization would remain vulnerable even at lower inventories. It may even be that, now, the only credible arsenal is below threshold. George Kennan's celebrated proposal[25] to reduce the world arsenals initially to 50 percent of their current numbers is recognized as hard enough to implement. But it would be only the first step toward what is now clearly and urgently needed—a more than 90-percent reduction (Kennan proposed an ultimate reduction of more than 84 percent—adequate for strategic deterrence, if that is considered essential, but unlikely to trigger the nuclear winter. Still further reductions could then be contemplated.

The detonation of weapons stockpiles near or above threshold would be, we can now recognize, in contravention of the 1977 Geneva Convention on The Hostile Use of Environmental Modification Techniques, signed by 48 nations and duly ratified by the Soviet Union and the United States.[26] And Article 6 of the 1968 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty requires the United States and the Soviet Union, among other signatory states, "to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament. . . ." I do not imagine that these treaties can, by themselves, play a determining role in producing major reductions in the world strategic arsenals, but they establish some sense of international obligation and can at least expedite urgent bilateral and multilateral consultations.

VI

We have, by slow and imperceptible steps, been constructing a Doomsday Machine. Until recently—and then, only by accident—no one even noticed. And we have distributed its triggers all over the Northern Hemisphere. Every American and Soviet leader since 1945 has made critical decisions regarding nuclear war in total ignorance of the climatic catastrophe. Perhaps this knowledge would have moderated the subsequent course of world events and, especially, the nuclear arms race. Today, at least, we have no excuse for failing to factor the catastrophe into long-term decisions on strategic policy.

Since it is the soot produced by urban fires that is the most sensitive trigger of the climatic catastrophe, and since such fires can be ignited even by low-yield strategic weapons, it appears that the most critical ready index of the world nuclear arsenals, in terms of climatic change, may be the total number of strategic warheads. (There is some dependence on yield, to be sure, and future very low-yield, high-accuracy burrowing warheads could destroy strategic targets without triggering the nuclear winter, as discussed above.) For other purposes there are other indices—numbers of submarine-launched warheads, throw-weight (net payload deliverable to target), total megatonnage, etc. From different choices of such indices, different conclusions about strategic parity can be drawn. In the total number of strategic warheads, however, the United States is "ahead" of the Soviet Union and always has been.

Very roughly, the level of the world strategic arsenals necessary to induce the climatic catastrophe seems to be somewhat around 500 to 2,000 warheads—an estimate that may be somewhat high for airbursts over cities, and somewhat low for high-yield ground-bursts. The intrinsic uncertainty in this number is itself of strategic importance, and prudent policy would assume a value below the low end of the plausible range.

National or global inventories above this rough threshold move the world arsenals into a region that might be called the "Doomsday Zone." If the world arsenals were well below this rough threshold, no concatenation of computer malfunction, carelessness, unauthorized acts, communications failure, miscalculation and madness in high office could unleash the nuclear winter. When global arsenals are above the threshold, such a catastrophe is at least possible. The further above threshold we are, the more likely it is that a major exchange would trigger the climatic catastrophe.

Traditional belief and childhood experience teach that more weapons buy more security. But since the advent of nuclear weapons and the acquisition of a capacity for "overkill," the possibility has arisen that, past a certain point, more nuclear weapons do not increase national security. I wish here to suggest that, beyond the climatic threshold, an increase in the number of strategic weapons leads to a pronounced decline in national (and global) security. National security is not a zero-sum game. Strategic insecurity of one adversary almost always means strategic insecurity for the other. Conventional pre-1945 wisdom, no matter how deeply felt, is not an adequate guide in an age of apocalyptic weapons.

If we are not content with world inventories above the threshold, we are saying that it is safe to trust the fate of our global civilization and perhaps our species to all leaders, civilian and military, of all present and future major nuclear powers; and to the command and control efficiency and technical reliability in those nations now and in the indefinite future. For myself, I would far rather have a world in which the climatic catastrophe cannot happen, independent of the vicissitudes of leaders, institutions and machines. This seems to me elementary planetary hygiene, as well as elementary patriotism.

Something like a thousand warheads (or a few hundred megatons) is of the same order as the arsenals that were publicly announced in the 1950s and 1960s as an unmistakable strategic deterrent, and as sufficent to destroy either the United States or the Soviet Union "irrecoverably." Considerably smaller arsenals would, with present improvements in accuracy and reliability, probably suffice. Thus it is possible to contemplate a world in which the global strategic arsenals are below threshold, where mutual deterrence is in effect to discourage the use of those surviving warheads, and where, in the unhappy event that some warheads are detonated, there is little likelihood of the climatic catastrophe.[27]

To achieve so dramatic a decline in the global arsenals will require not only heroic measures by both the United States and the Soviet Union—it will also require consistent action by Britain, France and China, especially when the U.S. and Soviet arsenals are significantly reduced. Currently proposed increments in the arsenals at least of France would bring that nation's warhead inventory near or above threshold. I have already remarked on the strategic instability, in the context of the climatic catastrophe only, of the warhead inventories of these nations. But if major cuts in the U.S. and Soviet arsenals were under way, it is not too much to hope that the other major powers would, after negotiations, follow suit. These considerations also underscore the danger of nuclear weapons proliferation to other nations, especially when the major inventories are in steep decline.

Figure 2, on the following page, illustrates the growth of the American and Soviet strategic inventories from 1945 to the present.[28] To minimize confusion in the figure, the British, French and Chinese arsenals are not shown; they are, however, as just mentioned, significant on the new scale of climatically arsenals. We see from the figure that the United States passed the Doomsday Threshold around 1953, and the Soviet Union not until about 1966. The largest disparity in the arsenals was in 1961 (a difference of some 6,000 warheads). At the present time the disparity is less than it has been in any year since 1955. A published extrapolation of the present strategic arsenals into 1985 is shown as dashed, nearly vertical lines, accommodating new U.S. (Pershing II, cruise, MX and Trident) and Soviet (SS-21, -22, -23) strategic systems. If these extrapolations are valid, the United States and the Soviet Union would have almost identical numbers of inventories by the late 1980s.

The uppermost (dash-dot) curve in Figure 2 shows the total U.S. and Soviet arsenals (essentially the world arsenals) climbing upward since about 1970 with a very steep slope, the slope steepening still more if the projection is valid. Such exponential or near-exponential runaways are expected in arms races where each side's rate of growth is proportional to its perception of the adversay's weapons inventory; but it is likewise clear that such rapid growth cannot continue indefinitely. In all natural and human systems, such steep growth rates are eventually stopped, often catastrophically.

It is widely agreed—although different people have different justifications for this conclusion—that world arsenals must be reduced significantly. There is also general agreement, with a few demurrers, that at least the early and middle stages of a significant decline can be verified by national technical means and other procedures. The first stage of major arms reduction will have to overcome a new source of reluctance, when almost all silos could be reliably destroyed in a sub-threshold first strike. To overcome this reluctance, both sides will have prudently maintained an invulnerable retaliatory force, which itself would later move to subthreshold levels. (It would even be advantageous to each nation to provide certain assistance in the development of such a force by the other.)

As arsenals are reduced still further, the fine tuning of the continuing decline may have to be worked out very carefully and with additional safeguards to guarantee continuing rough strategic parity. As threshold inventories are approached, some verifiable upper limits on yields as well as numbers would have to be worked out, to minimize the burning of cities if a nuclear conflict erupted. On the other hand, the deceleration of the arms race would have an inertia of its own, as the acceleration does; and successful first steps would create a climate conducive to subsequent steps.

There are three proposals now prominently discussed in the United States: Nuclear Freeze, Build-Down, and Deep Cuts. Their possible effects are diagrammed in Figure 2. They are by no means mutually exclusive, nor do they exhaust the possible approaches. A negotiated Freeze would at least prevent the continuing upward escalation in stockpiles, would forestall the deployment of more destabilizing systems, and would probably be accompanied by agreement on immediate annual phased reductions (the curved lines in the middle to late 1980s in Figure 2). To reduce the perceived temptation for a first strike, de-MIRVing of missiles during arms reduction may be essential.

The most commonly cited method of following the Freeze with reductions is incorporated in the Kennedy-Hatfield Freeze Resolution: percentage reductions. Under this approach, the two sides would agree on a percentage—often quoted as being between five percent and ten percent—and would agree to decrease deployed warheads by that percentage annually. The percentage reduction method was proposed to the Soviet Union by the United States at the Vienna Summit in June 1979 and was to be applied to the limits and sub-limits of the SALT II accords until these reached a reduction of 50 percent.

The Build-Down proposal is one in which modernization is permitted, but each side must pay a price in additional reductions of warheads for each warhead mounted on a modernized missile. In many current versions of the proposal, it would also require both sides to decrease their total warhead inventories by about five percent a year (again, the percentage annual reduction approach), to ensure that at least some reductions would take place even if modernization did not. The rate of decline for Build-Down illustrated in Figure 2 is essentially that of Representative Albert Gore (D.-Tenn.), in which rough parity at 8,500 warheads each is adopted as a goal for 1991-92, and the levels are reduced to 6,500 warheads each by 1997.[29]

There is concern that the "modernization" of strategic systems that Build-Down encourages might open the door to still more destabilizing weapons. It is also by no means clear that all proponents of Build-Down envision further reductions below the interim goal of about 5,000 warheads each for the United States and Soviet Union. If this rate of Build-Down continued indefinitely, the two nations would not cross back below threshold until about the year 2020. As dramatic a change from the present circumstances as this represents, in light of the present global crisis, it is, I think, too leisurely a pace.

Deep Cuts, originally advocated by George Kennan and Noel Gayler[30] as an initial halving of the global arsenals in some relatively short period of time, proposes the turning in of the fission triggers of thermonuclear weapons, deployed or undeployed, to a binational or multinational authority, with the triggers subsequently gainfully consumed in nuclear power plants (the ultimate in beating swords into plowshares). A highly schematic curve for something like Deep Cuts is also shown in Figure 2, starting from Gore's assumption of parity by 1991-92. Halving of the present global arsenals would then occur around 1995, and the global arsenals would return to below the Doomsday Threshold by the year 2000.

The actual shape of these declining curves would very likely have kinks and wiggles in them to accommodate the details of a bilaterally—and eventually multilaterally—agreed-upon plan to reduce the arsenals without compromising the security of any of the nuclear powers. The Deep Cuts curve shown has a rate of decline only about as steep as the rate of rise beginning in 1970. Much steeper declines may be feasible and should be considered.

No one contends it will be easy to reverse the nuclear arms race. It is required at least for the same reasons that were used to justify the arms race in the first place—the national security of the United States and the Soviet Union. It is necessarily an enterprise of great magnitude. John Stuart Mill said: "Against a great evil, a small remedy does not produce a small result. It produces no result at all." But if the same technical ingenuity, dedication and resources were devoted to the downward slopes in Figure 2 as to the upward slopes, there is no reason to doubt that it could be negotiated safely.

In the deployment of more stabilizing weapons systems, in the possible development—especially in later stages of arms reductions—of novel means of treaty verification, and (perhaps) in the augmentation of conventional armaments, it will, of course, be expensive.

But, given the stakes, prudent nuclear power should be willing to spend more every year to defuse the arms race and prevent nuclear war than it does on all military preparedness. For comparison, in the United States the annual budget of the Department of Defense is about 10,000 times that of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, quite apart from any questions about the dedication and effectiveness of the ACDA. The equivalent disparity is even greater in many other nations. I believe that the technical side of guaranteeing a major multilateral and strategically secure global arms reduction can be devised and deployed for considerably less—perhaps even a factor of 100 less—than the planet's direct military expenditures of $540 billion per year.[31]

Such figures give some feeling for the chasm that separates a prudent policy in face of our present knowledge of nuclear war from the actual present polices of the nuclear powers. Likewise, nations far removed from the conflict, even nations with little or no investment in the quarrels among the nuclear powers, stand to be destroyed in a nuclear war, rather than benefiting from the mutual annihilation of the superpowers. They too, one might think, would be wise to devote considerable resources to help ensure that nuclear war does not break out.

VII

In summary, cold, dark, radioactivity, pyrotoxins and ultraviolet light following a nuclear war—including some scenarios involving only a small fraction of the world strategic arsenals—would imperil every survivor on the planet. There is a real danger of the extinction of humanity. A threshold exists at which the climatic catastrophe could be triggered, very roughly around 500–2,000 strategic warheads. A major first strike may be an act of national suicide, even if no retaliation occurs. Given the magnitude of the potential loss, no policy declarations and no mechanical safeguards can adequately guarantee the safety of the human species. No national rivalry or ideological confrontation justifies putting the species at risk. Accordingly, there is a critical need for safe and verifiable reductions of the world strategic inventories to below threshold. At such levels, still adequate for deterrence, at least the worst could not happen should a nuclear war break out.

National security policies that seem prudent or even successful during a term of office or a tour of duty may work to endanger national—and global—security over longer periods of time. In many respects it is just such short-term thinking that is responsible for the present world crisis. The looming prospect of the climatic catastrophe makes short-term thinking even more dangerous. The past has been the enemy of the present, and the present the enemy of the future.

The problem cries out for an ecumenical perspective that rises above cant, doctrine and mutual recrimination, however apparently justified, and that at least partly transcends parochial fealties in time and space. What is urgently required is a coherent, mutual agreed upon, long-term policy for dramatic reductions in nuclear armaments, and a deep commitment, embracing decades, to carry it out.

Our talent, while imperfect, to foresee the future consequences of our present actions and to change our course appropriately is a hallmark of the human species, and one of the chief reasons for our success over the past million years. Our future depends entirely on how quickly and how broadly we can refine this talent. We should plan for and cherish our fragile world as we do our children and our grandchildren: there will be no other place for them to live. It is nowhere ordained that we must remain in bondage to nuclear weapons.

I deeply appreciate the encouragement, suggestions and critical assessments provided by Lester Grinspoon, Steven Soter and, especially, Ann Druyan, and the dedicated transcriptions, through many drafts, by Mary Roth.

This article would not have been possible without the high scientific competence and dedication of my co-authors on the TTAPS study, Richard P. Turco, Owen B. Toon, Thomas P. Ackerman, and James B. Pollack, and my 19 coauthors of the accompanying scientific paper on the long-term biological consequences of nuclear war. Finally, I wish to thank my Soviet colleagues, V. V. Alexandrov, E. I. Chazov, G. S. Golitsyn, and E. P. Velikhov among others, for organizing independent confirmations of the probable existence of a post-nuclear-war climatic catastrophe, and for helping to generate a different kind of climate—one of mutual concern and cooperation that is essential if we are to emerge safely from the trap that our two nations have jointly set for ourselves, our civilization, and our species.

Paragraph 2 goes on: "Each State Party to this Convention undertakes not to assist, encourage or induce any State, group of States or international organization to engage in activities countrary to the provisions of paragraph 1 . . ."

[27] Since higher-yield tactical warheads can also be used to burn cities, and might do so inadvertently, especially in Europe, provision for their elimination should also eventually be made. But initial attention should be directed to strategic warheads and their delivery systems.

[28] The total warheads calculated in Figure 2 include strategic and theater weapons, but not tactical weapons. Not all published sources are in perfect agreement on these numbers. The principal sources used here are the Report of the Secretary of Defense [Harold Brown] to the Congress on the FY 1982 Budget, FY 1983 Authorization Request and FY 1986 Defense Programs, Washington: Department of Defense, 1981; and National Defense Budget Estimates, FY 1983, Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense, Comptroller, March 1982.

Beyond 1983, projected increases in arsenals are shown for U.S. and Soviet arsenals as nearly vertical dashed lines, with the sum of these arsenals as the line at the top of the Figure terminating in an arrowhead. The data are from Frank Barnaby in the special issue of Ambio cited in footnote 5, pp. 76–83. See also Counterforce Issues for the U.S. Strategic Nuclear Forces, Congressional Budget Office, January 1978.

Figure 2 shows three regions: an upper region in which the nuclear winter could almost certainly be triggered; a lower regional at which it could not be triggered; and a transition zone, shown shaded. The boundaries of this transition zone are more uncertain than shown, and depend among other things on targeting strategy. But the threshold probably lies between several hundred and a few thousand contemporary strategic weapons.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON S. 47, THE SHIPPING ACT OF 1984

● Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have consistently held the view that legislation of many foreign nations—the so-called blocking statutes, making it illegal for their shipping and other companies to reveal information in certain circumstances, have the effect of severely impeding the enforcement of the laws of the United States against foreign companies. My most recent expression of that view was in remarks on the Senate floor on February 23, 1984, in support of S. 47, the Shipping Act of 1984.

I am afraid that I used an inappropriate example in those remarks when I referred to the recent North Atlantic shipping antitrust case. I have been informed subsequently that in both the Government and private antitrust litigation relating to North Atlantic shipping, the burdens of that litigation were borne by United States and foreign shipping companies in a flag-blind manner.

However, despite the particular North Atlantic case, I wish to emphasize that generally these foreign blocking statutes are inimical to the interests of the United States. In that regard, I refer my colleagues to the Senate report on the Shipping Act Amendments of 1978—Senate Report No. 95-966, and the views expressed therein by the Commerce Committee and others concerning the possible obstacles presented by foreign blocking statutes.●

ORDERS FOR THURSDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business until 10:30 a.m. in which Senators may speak for not more than 2 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on tomorrow the Senate will convene at 10 a.m. After the recognition of two leaders under the standing order, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business until 10:30 a.m. At the hour of 10:30 a.m. or sooner if the time for the transaction of routine morning business is not utilized, the Senate will resume consideration of the unfinished business, which is House Joint Resolution 492.

Mr. President, it is anticipated that there will be a number of votes tomorrow. It is the hope of the leadership on this side that we can finish the bill before the day is out.

Mr. President, I remind Senators of the strong possibility that tomorrow also will be a late day.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have consulted with the minority leader who indicates he has no requirement for further time. I see no other Senator seeking recognition. Therefore, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate now stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and, at 10:26 p.m., the Senate recessed until Thursday, April 5, 1984, at 10 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, April 4, 1984

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We thank You, O God, that in so many of the moments of life—in joy and sorrow, in happiness or pain—we are surrounded by those who support us and who brighten our lives. For friends who accept us, for colleagues who correct us, for family who forgive us, we offer this our word of thanksgiving and praise. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

On March 19, 1984:

H.R. 3655. An act to raise the retirement age for judges of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia and judges of the District of Columbia Court of Appeals.

On March 20, 1984:

H.R. 2173. An act to amend the Contract Services for Drug Dependent Federal Offenders Act of 1978 to authorize additional appropriations to carry out such act; and

H.R. 4194. An act to extend the expiration date of section 252 of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act.

On March 21, 1984:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1852) "An act to extend the expiration date of the Defense Production Act of 1950," disagreed to by the House, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. GARN, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. TRIBLE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE LATE PETER J. MURPHY, JR., PROFESSIONAL STAFF MEMBER, HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE

(Mr. WHITTEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and on behalf of all the members of the committee, I wish to take this time to offer a word of praise for Pete Murphy of our staff who died of cancer yesterday.

Pete had worked with our Defense Subcommittee since 1968 and had been staff director of that subcommittee for the last 2 years. He served as a special agent with the Federal Bureau of Investigation before being selected for our committee staff. He was a man of great industry and dedication. Like others on our staff, he put in long hours, often working on weekends. He was one of the most knowledgeable people in Washington in military matters and especially in defense procurement. He had a special talent for dissecting budget requests—ferreting out the critical questions in a wide variety of complex defense programs. Thoroughness was his hallmark. His integrity was a legend throughout the appropriations and defense communities.

Pete hailed from Louisville, Ky. He earned both a bachelor's degree and a law degree from the University of Louisville.

Pete served in the Marine Corps in the Pacific during World War II. He was a member of the first medium-tank unit in the Pacific area which was formed on Guadalcanal for the invasion of Bougainville. Pete participated in the Guam invasion and the invasion of Iwo Jima, where he was wounded during the assault on the airfield when his tank struck a land mine, killing other members of the tank crew. Pete received many campaign ribbons and was awarded the Purple Heart.

Pete was an exceptional public servant. He was a proud man—proud of his service with the committee and proud of the Marine Corps. But, Mr. Speaker, above all he was proud of his family which he cherished so dearly. Because of the demands of his work he sacrificed much time which would have been spent with his family. But Pete had the philosophy that it was not the amount of time spent with loved ones, it was the quality of the time. They especially enjoyed the hours they were able to spend together in the tranquility of their cottage in rural Virginia.

Our heartfelt sympathy goes out to Pete's wife Eve and their six children. He will be deeply missed by the members of the committee and by our staff.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTEN. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I join my beloved chairman, JAMIE WHITTEN, in offering my condolences to the family of Peter Murphy. He was a very close personal friend of mine. We spent a lot of time together out in the field. He came to my home. I have been to his home. He had a beautiful family, and an illustrious career. He was a war hero in the Southwest Pacific during World War II. He served with great distinction as a member of the FBI. He was an outstanding chief counsel on our Defense Subcommittee on Appropriations, a highly dedicated, hard-working, conscientious man, a great family man, a great American, and we are all going to miss him.

FIRST CONCURRENT BUDGET RESOLUTION FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

(Mr. DERRICK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, for weeks now we all have been stressing the importance of slashing the deficit. Today we have an opportunity to cast a vote to begin balancing our Federal checkbook. It may mean voting against favored programs, not giving as much to defense, and increasing revenues. But now is the time to act. For every day we wait, the national debt increases $765 million. By the time I finish these short remarks, we will owe an additional $200,000 in interest.

Before this House today are several alternatives which their supporters feel are the best way to reduce the deficit. The amount of deficit reduction does not vary much and no plan does enough. We still end up with a large deficit each year for the next 3 years. The important thing is that we take that difficult first step in stemming the flow of red ink.
